Mr. REED of Missouri. I have no more authority to speak than any other Senator, except that I happen to be chairman of the committee. I repeat that, as far as the committee is concerned, we are ready to proceed with the debate until it is finished. At the same time, we do not want to be understood as taking any action which will bar any Senator from a reasonable opportunity to present his views. It seems to me that under all the conditions we might let the debate proceed as long as Senators desire to speak this afternoon, which will probably consume the afternoon, and then we can make proper arrangements. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there are certain advantages to be gained from a popular government which are not to be gained from a benevolent despotism. Let us take a very small and insignificant instance—that of the matter of schools. There are many people in the United States who would like to see a department of education established in Washington, with power greatly to increase the amount of money spent in our various schools, and with power to direct examinations, and to determine what kind of teachers and school boards there should be for those schools. There are some States where the State board of education follows a policy of directing, through the locals boards, how schools should be run, how they should be built, the qualifications of teachers, and so on.

There is no question, I think, that by central direction one could secure better schoolhouses, perhaps more highly trained teachers, perhaps a more uniform curriculum, and so forth, than by the method followed of having the local school boards choose their own teachers, set their own standards, and discover whether the teachers are adequate and whether the pupils are receiving a real education or only a make-believe education.

Nevertheless, I am one of those who believe that the local school boards should have that power, even though the results produced are not so good as might be expected from a great centralized educational authority. I believe it, because it gives to the members of the local school boards that practice in self-government which is necessary for the development of citizenship; that useful practice in making mistakes—mistakes which they can see immediately after they have been made. It gives them the opportunity to learn from these mistakes, and therefore the use of local school boards is beneficial to citizenship, even though the schools which are created under their control may not be as good as those which might be created under central control. I have brought up that instance, Mr. President, merely to show one small way in which local self-government works for the benefit of citizenship, even though it results in standards not satisfactory to the majority of people in the United States.

Now, to come to the question before us, the State of Illinois has been accused before the Senate of deliberately and by a large majority selecting a man who was not suited to sit in this body. I can find no justification in the Constitution for our acting as an advisory body to the State of Illinois. The Constitution provides that the President of the United States may not appoint a Federal officer except by the advice and consent of the Senate. Judges, United States marshals, even postmasters, throughout the United States, are appointed by the President, but only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No man can become a second lieutenant in the Army, or a postmaster at the "four-corners," unless the Senate advises and consents. But there is nothing said in the Constitution about the Senate having to advise and consent regarding the qualifications of a candidate for membership in this body. Of course, it seems to me that such an idea was furthest from the minds of the founding fathers. Had they intended that the Senate should be the judge of the qualifications of candidates for membership, and that the States could not be trusted to elect to this body any one whom the Senate decided was not fit for a seat in it, the Constitution would have stated so. It would have been quite easy to have put in a clause providing that the States might select two Senators who could have their seats "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." But such a thing was furthest from their thoughts. The Constitution never would have been adopted by the States had it been supposed that the Senate was going to set itself up as the judge of the morals and conduct and the qualifications, apart from the qualifications mentioned in the Constitution, of those who were to be elected to office.

Of course, I realize that there is distinguished opinion on both sides of this question, and that the majority of the Senate does not agree with this position. But, in view of the fact that those of us who vote against this resolution have already been accused of being "partners in crime" for so doing, and will be accused in the future from time to time, as we have so frequently seen in other cases, of condoning corruption, it seems to me only fair to state once more our reasons for voting against the resolution, without condoning in any way any actions that Mr. SMITH may or may not have performed.

We are not interested at all in the personal case of Mr. SMITH. We are deeply interested in the rights of the people of the sovereign State of Illinois. We desire to preserve their right to elect to membership in this body anyone who is a citizen in good and regular standing, and who is not disqualified by the disqualifications mentioned in the Constitution. We are opposed to this resolution because we do not wish to see set up here a select committee of what has been called the most exclusive and distinguished club in the world, a select membership committee, that shall say whether or not we wish to have come and sit with us some one of whose habits or whose past performances we do not approve.

I agree that the membership of the Senate being what it is at present, we might pick out a better set of candidates than is picked out in the hurlyburly of politics, and by popular government. Benevolent despotism always does things better and more efficiently than does popular government. But I do not agree for a moment that in the future it would be better for this country if we were to set up an omniscient despotism.

It seems to me that it is far more important that we should permit the people of the United States to select bad men to represent them in the Senate, as was stated in Philadelphia in the Constitutional Convention would be the case, that the people would from time to time elect bad men; I repeat, it is far better for us to permit the people of the States to elect bad men to seats in the Senate than it is for us to destroy our form of government, to destroy State sovereignty, to deny the right of the people to elect whom they choose, and thereby to take away from them one of the most precious duties and responsibilities of their citizenship. In the future if we keep on doing things of this kind we shall remove so many of the responsibilities of citizenship from the citizens of the United States that they will be not citizens but subjects; they will be not fit to be citizens, not fit to exercise the duties of citizenship, but only fit to be faithful subjects, paying their taxes and accepting words of wisdom that may roll down on their heads from the moral heights of Capitol Hill.

Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate a statement of the attorney general of Illinois, as made in the hearings, part 7, January 7, 1928, before the special committee. I ask that the clerk at the desk read the first paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT OF OSCAR E. CARLSTROM, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. CARLSTROM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall speak very briefly, merely announcing the position and attitude of the State of Illinois with reference to this inquiry from a legal and constitutional standpoint. I speak with hesitancy because of the gravity of the situation, and the fact that I speak extemporaneously. I shall make only a most careful statement of the position of the State, which is the same that I announced when I appeared before the Committee on Privileges and Elections when they were considering the case of the Senator from Illinois, where one member at least of this committee was present as a member of that committee at the last session. We there maintained consistently the position that until the right of the Senator from Illinois to sit as a Member of the Senate had been recognized to the extent of giving him the oath, he was not a Member of this body, and until that was done he was not subject to the Senate or to the jurisdiction of this committee on the question of facts, persisting only in his right to sit as the duly elected, duly constituted representative in the United States Senate according to the constitutional rights to which we hold him to be entitled. We respectfully adhere to that position. I could not do otherwise, speaking for the sovereignty of the State of Illinois, under the Constitution of the United States as we understand it; and my view, as shown by the records of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, is fully stated and I need not repeat it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, we have here the appeal from the State of Illinois, through her properly elected attorney general, that we grant Senator-elect SMITH the rights to which he is entitled under the Constitution.

One other point, Mr. President, and I shall be done.

Mr. FESS. Before the Senator enters upon that point, will he yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. FESS. While this report specifies upon what basis the action is taken, which might be regarded as broader than the mere character that goes to the qualifications and elections, we did take action before this in the case of the appointment of Mr. SMITH, where there could not be any question as to an election. The inquiry must be confined purely to the matter of qualifications, and the qualifications there must be personal, must go to his character, a very broad term, it would seem to me, for no one questioned that the Governor of Illinois had the right to appoint Mr. SMITH to fill a vacancy created by the death of Senator McKinley. That question was not raised. There was no doubt about the accuracy or the completeness of the credentials which he presented. Yet this body refused to recognize that appointment, on the theory that he was personally not acceptable to sit in this body. So far as I can see, that is all there is to it. If we act on that theory, where is the limit?

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no limit.

I thank the Senator for his interruption. He will remember that we debated the matter at that time, and we expressed the opinion that if the Senate really wanted to know the opinion of the people of the United States it might submit to them a constitutional amendment stating that States shall be permitted to elect two Senators to this body "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" and see how far it got with any such amendment. The people of the United States have no desire whatsoever to see the Senate of the United States act in the same capacity toward the ambassadors from the various States in which we act toward postmasters, members of the Army, members of the Diplomatic Service, and other appointees of the President. The appointment of an official by the President, by a single official, is one thing. The expressed opinion and choice of the people of the sovereign States is another thing. And, as the Senator from Ohio has pointed out, the choice of the Governor of the State of Illinois, when he was by the people of Illinois given the privilege of making that choice, is an act of high privilege under the Constitution, which he had every right to exercise and which, I believe, we had no right to nullify. Yet a majority of the Senate, acting under a wave of popular dislike for what has happened in these elections, a popular fear of the use of money, a popular distrust of popular government, acted to nullify the action of the Governor of Illinois.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. It was said to-day that there were instances immediately following the Civil War where the prima facie cases presented by the credentials were not sufficient and the Senators elect were denied the right to take the oath. Those cases, as the Senator will recall, grew out of a very deep bitterness which was the inevitable result of the Civil War. The fourteenth amendment was the basis of reconstruction. It was adopted and ratified in 1868. Reconstruction was completed along about 1870. The cases which came up, where the party was denied the right to be sworn in, went to the question of loyalty and that was specified in the Constitution. It was in the fourteenth amendment. There may be cases which came up before the fourteenth amendment had been ratified, but up to that time all of those matters were in question as to reconstruction.

This body, dominated by a bitter spirit in the North against a certain section of the country growing out of the Civil War, could easily deny the right of the one applying to be sworn in, even in case that were done outside of the fourteenth amendment. Is it a safe rule to follow, considering the intensity of feeling following the Civil War, to say that what took place then should be the practice of this body, which was at that time different from what it had ever been before or has been since? Would that be safe as a precedent for us to follow?

Mr. BINGHAM. It certainly would not. Furthermore, it would also be true, would it not, that if in times of peace and quiet like the present, without any great issue like slavery or a recent conflict between the States upsetting the country, we proceed without haste to establish a precedent of this kind it is worse. If in quiet days we say deliberately to the State which appears here through its only Senator now on the floor, and through its attorney general and through the members of its legislature, to our committee, asking us to give the oath to the man they selected, that we deny their claim, what does the Senator think will happen when this country is excited? Supposing the country is divided over a matter which arouses the greatest amount of national passion, and certain Senators elect come here who disagree with the majority in the United States? Does the Senator think they will be seated? Will not a precedent established in quiet times have an even worse effect in unquiet times?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio thinks it a very dangerous precedent. If the Senator from Connecticut will permit, I would like to put a specific question. The fourteenth amendment very specifically says that whenever the right to vote of any male citizen of 21 years of age is denied, that the basis of representation—I am quoting as it is—in the Congress from that State shall be reduced in the ratio that that right is denied to the voting population of 21 years of age and over. Suppose that a Senator elect presents himself from a State where the population which is denied that right to vote is equal to the population that votes, then the basis of representation in the other body would be cut in half. But it is not; it never has been. Suppose that we in this body should say, "You have been elected in a State where the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution has been violated. Stand aside upon that basis." If this is a precedent to be set on the question of character, where half the population is denied, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, the right to vote, would not we be justified in giving that as a reason for saying, "Stand aside; we do not intend to let you take the oath"? If we have the votes to do it, can we not do it on this precedent?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly; on the precedent which is aimed to be established in this case we would have that right; but I do not think, believing as I do in State rights, that we ought to do it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator knows I do not believe in that either, but I am asking the question. Is not this a precedent which would fit that case, and would not that be a condition which we could allege with as much force as this one?

Mr. BINGHAM. Undoubtedly this would be such a precedent that we might go to almost any extreme in denying a Senator elect the right to take the oath. Anyone who came here with a different religious belief from the majority, with a different attitude toward the eighteenth amendment, with a different kind of education, speaking a different language, could be denied the oath. All sorts of things one might easily imagine happening, and being used as an excuse to deny the Senator elect the right to his seat just as much as those the Senator from Ohio just mentioned.

It seems to me it is a most dangerous precedent we are establishing, and without any real national necessity for doing so, because this is a time of peace, when the Nation is not in danger, and when we ought to consider these things calmly and dispassionately. We can well afford to say, as I should like to say, as I would like to have the Senate say to the State of Illinois, "You elected by a big majority a man who does not measure up to the standards which the majority of the people in the United States would like to see as Members of this body; but you elected him, and, of course, if that is the kind of man you want to have represent you, that is your business and not ours."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator permit me to address an inquiry to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Ohio referred in a disparaging way to precedents set by both Houses of Congress with reference to Members elect who had participated in the Civil War on the part of the Confederate States. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, were he a Member of either House at that time, would he have voted that way?

Mr. FESS. Wherever the point of difference was a matter of violation of the fourteenth amendment——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; my question has no relation to the fourteenth amendment. I want the Senator to assume the case of a man coming here with a certificate of election, who confessedly had participated in the Civil War upon the part of the Confederate States. Would the Senator, were he a Member of this body at that time, vote to admit him?

Mr. FESS. No; because the fourteenth amendment would forbid it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want the Senator to assume the case of a man who was not under the fourteenth amendment. The Senator will remember that that applied only to a man who had taken an oath to support the Constitution.

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want the Senator to assume the case of a man coming here who had not taken the oath to support the Constitution and had as a matter of fact participated in the rebellion. Would the Senator have voted to seat him?

Mr. FESS. Most likely I would if he had not originally taken the oath of office.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The fourteenth amendment provides that whenever one had taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and had subsequently participated in the rebellion he became ineligible.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want the Senator to suppose the case of a man who never did hold public office, never took any oath to support the Constitution of the United States, as millions of our citizens have not, but who came here with a certificate of election and who was actually a general in the Civil War.

Mr. FESS. Had been, but not at that time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He had been, of course. The war was over and he came here with a certificate of election.

Mr. FESS. That would not disqualify him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Would the Senator vote to seat him?

Mr. FESS. Most likely I would.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. Suppose the same thing occurred again and there were rebellion in this country that was eventually suppressed, and one or more of those who participated in it, never having taken an oath to support the Constitution and thus not falling under the fourteenth amendment, should present themselves as Senators elect, would the Senator vote to seat them?

Mr. FESS. That is the same question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course it is the same question.

Mr. FESS. I have a concrete example that will enlighten the Senator from Montana. A man who had been elected to Congress, although under indictment and afterwards convicted of disloyalty, applied for entrance to the other body while I was a Member of it. It was a case of clear disloyalty. I voted to refuse to let him take the oath because he was not capable of taking the oath. He was disloyal and had been convicted of that crime.

Mr. NORRIS. Was not his certificate regular?

Mr. FESS. That particular thing was not under the fourteenth amendment. That will answer the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask the question again? Did the man whom the Senator voted to keep out have a certificate that was regular and signed by the Governor of the State?

Mr. FESS. He had a certificate of his election, but the disqualification was constitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly, but the certificate of election did not show that he was disloyal or that he had been indicted or that he had been convicted, did it? Why was he not sworn in first?

Mr. FESS. The certificate of election is not sufficient to validate either the fourteenth amendment or criminality.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but according to the argument the Senator makes and which the Senator from Connecticut likewise makes, the certificate of election is sufficient to let him be sworn in. Was that man sworn in?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator must go back and apologize for his vote or apologize for the position he takes here. He certainly is in a joint debate with himself.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator believe that a man who is disloyal to the Constitution, who has already been convicted of disloyalty, should be admitted to take the oath?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course not; I never would take the position taken by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut about the certificate being something that was more holy than the holy of holies. I concede that it does not cover up crime, that it is not inviolate, and that we can go behind it, and that the Senator was justified in voting as he did when a Member of the House. But now he is condemning us because we will not vote to give a man the right to take the oath of office when he did the same thing himself in another instance. I am surprised!

Mr. FESS. The Senator may be surprised, but the two cases are not at all parallel.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is like the lawyer who——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I must decline to yield further. I desire to get through with my speech. I am perfectly willing to allow the Senators to continue their colloquy in their own time, but I must decline to yield further at this time.

Mr. President, there have been a great many cases where Senators elect have come to this body with their election in doubt. We had one within the last three or four years. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] came here with his election in doubt. As a matter of fact, the Senate later decided that he had not been elected by a majority of the electorate. I did not so vote but, as usual, I was in the minority. The Senate decided that he had not been elected by a majority of the electorate but only by a minority; and yet that gentleman had been allowed to vote here on various questions, to take full part in representing his State, as he had a constitutional right to do, until the question had been settled, even though he had not been elected by a majority of the voters of his State, at least in the opinion of a majority of the Senate. I still think that he had been so elected, but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not wish to be interrupted. The point is that we have repeatedly allowed Senators to take the oath because their certificate stated they had been elected, and after they had taken the oath we permitted them to represent their States until we could look into the matter, as we are given the right to do under the Constitution, and determine whether or not they had been properly elected. It was found in that case after the Senator had been sitting here for over a year that he had not been properly elected, at least so a majority of the Senate said. He was then deprived of his seat; but in the meantime Iowa had had her full representation in the Senate. It seems to me that the same thing applies in this case.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, will not the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not going to speak much further.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a suggestion at that point. I do not think the Senator is quite fair in asking us to consider the Brookhart case as similar to the pending case. Of course, I will not submit my question without his consent, but I should like to submit it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like very much to conclude my remarks. It is not only in the Brookhart case that that was done but the same was true as to many other cases. It has been the almost universal practice in the Senate where there was doubt about the election to permit the Senator elect bringing credentials to present his credentials, to be sworn in, and then to have his case tried.

In section 5, the Constitution provides:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

That section follows section 4 in which the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives are considered. I should like to call the attention of Senators, and especially of those Senators who claim that our right to be the judge of the qualifications of our own Members is quite a different thing from our right to be the judge of the election of Members, to this fact: In section 4 the manner of holding elections is to be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Constitution reserves to Congress the right—that is, to both Houses—at any time by law to "make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The places of choosing Senators can not be determined by the Congress, but only by the people of the States. The times and manner of holding elections may be determined by the Congress, but not by the body concerned. That is quite clear from section 4; yet in section 5 it is provided that each House shall be the judge of the elections of its Members.

Mr. President, I submit that if the Constitution means that we can really provide any qualifications we like, that we can say that a man must be so tall and so broad and shall weigh so much and that he must have a certain color of hair or that he must subscribe to a certain religion or that he must be moral, or one thing or another—if the clause which provides that we shall be the judge of the qualifications gives us plenary power, as many Senators claim, to decide the nature of the man who is to be permitted to take his seat here, then why does not the Constitution give us the right to say that the times and manner of holding elections might also be determined by the Senate?

Why, Mr. President, the idea is preposterous. It was never intended by the 13 sovereign States which surrendered part of their sovereignty "in order to form a more perfect union" that the Senate should have the right to dictate to them with regard to the way they should hold their elections or as to the qualifications of the persons they were to choose; but it was intended merely that the Senate was to decide as a judge whether those elections had been properly conducted, whether the returns had been properly counted, whether the qualifications of the Member were such that he was not disqualified by the clause in the Constitution prescribing disqualifications.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to interrogate the Senator with respect to the remarks he was just making to the effect that the Senate may exclude a man for slight and trivial causes of no consequence at all; that it might exclude him for any cause. The same provision of the Constitution gives to the Senate the right to expel a Member. Has it occurred to the Senator that the Senate may expel a Member for exactly the same trivial causes, the color of his hair, the kind of clothes he wears, or any other trivial cause that the Senate might think sufficient?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there is a very interesting difference there, and I am glad that the Senator has brought out that point.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; there is an interesting difference as to the number of votes required; that is all. But I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Constitution has not endeavored to define the causes for which a man may be expelled any more than it has attempted to define the causes for which he may be excluded.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Constitution provides:

> Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For what causes?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, of course, I am at a great disadvantage in arguing with the Senator from Montana, for he is one of the most distinguished constitutional lawyers in the United States, and, as I have repeatedly stated, I am not a lawyer of any kind; I am merely trying to find out what the Constitution means according to an ordinary common-sense interpretation——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And I am trying to help the Senator.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator; his help is greatly appreciated.

In this particular clause of the Constitution it is stated that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings"—it gives each House the right to make rules—"punish its Members for disorderly behavior," or infringement of the rules, in other words. Now, to what extent may that punishment go? How far can we go in punishing a Member? The Constitution then goes on to say, "and, with the concurrence of two-thirds," it may even go so far as to expel a Member. Personally, I do not think that the right to expel a Member could properly come from any other cause than the disorderly behavior here referred to or a breaking of the rules, but still by that clause two-thirds of the Senate undoubtedly are given the right to expel. As my able colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], said in discussing this question a few weeks ago that the fathers evidently felt that they could always trust two-thirds of the Senate to see that justice was done to a Member. They could not trust a mere majority. Now, in the case of being the judge of the elections, the judge of the returns, and judge of the qualifications, only a quorum is required to do business. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana, does he not think that if the fathers, who in writing the Constitution gave two-thirds of the Members of the Senate the right to expel, had supposed for a moment that the judgment of the qualifications which they reposed in the Senate gave to the Senate the right to determine those qualifications, they would have permitted these most important matters to be decided by a simple majority vote? Would they not have required a two-thirds vote? If not, why require a two-thirds vote for expulsion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is an entirely different matter. There is no reason for making any distinction between the qualifications and the elections. The qualifications are coupled up with the elections and returns; they are all determined by a majority vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Exactly; that is the point which I am trying to make, and then I am through.

As the Senator has said, the questions are coupled with the elections and returns; the Senate acts as a judge as to whether the election has been properly carried out; the Senate does not decide where or when or in what manner the election shall take place. It judges whether the elections have been properly carried out; it judges whether the returns have been properly counted; it judges whether the man who presents himself with credentials for a seat is disqualified under the Constitution or whether his qualifications are such as to entitle him to his seat here. There is no question whatever that if the sovereign States which gave up a part of their sovereignty in order to form this Union had supposed that we were going to tell them what kind of a man they could elect, and had put it in the Constitution, the Constitution would never have been adopted. As the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] said a few moments ago, there are no affirmative qualifications; the people of the States are to determine those for themselves. There are disqualifications, and the Senate is the judge as to whether or not the man is disqualified to take his seat under the Constitution.

I hope very sincerely, Mr. President, that the future will not be so dark as it looks to those of us who still believe in the rights of the States and in the importance of that doctrine. The action of the Senate in this case is foreordained, for the Senate has already gone on record two or three times. As mentioned by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], it denied Mr. SMITH, coming here with the unquestioned certificate of the governor of his State, the right to take the oath. I most sincerely hope that the actions which the Senate has taken and the one which it is about to take will not result as badly as it seems to some of us is likely to be the case; I am more interested in preserving the fundamental principles on which this Government was founded and which I believe will lead to happiness in the future than I am in any individual case that may arise. Were I not so deeply interested in preserving to the States the rights guaranteed them under the Constitution, rights which they never surrendered when they adopted the Constitution, I would not place myself in the unfortunate position of being accused by the Senator from Missouri of being one of those who are "partners in crime."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator elect from Illinois, Mr. SMITH, made this statement to the Associated Press:

> Not unless and until the right of my State to such full, equal, and continuous representation is first accorded, I can not become a party to an unwarranted precedent, nor to any pretended inquiry as to my personal fitness for association with the distinguished men now composing the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, for a very few moments I wish to address myself to that statement. I think that there has been some misapprehension both in the Senate and out of it as to the clause of the Constitution upon which that statement is based.

In discussing the Smith and Vare cases, it has frequently been said that the constitutional provision "that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate" has some bearing upon this case.

Inside and outside of the Senate those who have favored the seating of Mr. VARE and Mr. SMITH have treated this particular provision of the Constitution just as if the Constitution, in Article I, section 5, provided as follows:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members—
> But—
> no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

I wish to point out that there is no such connection between the two provisions of the Constitution. It is true that it is provided in section 3 as follows:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

These are purely disqualifications.

However, the Constitution makers in section 5 gave plenary power to both Houses to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its Members by providing:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

There is no limitation and there is no qualification of this plenary power. The provision about the States being deprived of their representation comes long afterwards in Article V. That article has nothing to do with the question of qualifications at all. It has nothing to do with elections at all; it has nothing to do with returns at all; indeed, it refers to but one contingent possibility, and that contingent possibility is an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in a little while. It does not deal with those things which are prohibited or those things which are required. It deals only with the contingent case of when amendments shall be made to the Constitution when it points out how those amendments shall be made.

Article V is as follows:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Mr. President, words in a written instrument must be taken in connection with the whole instrument, it is true; but also they must be taken in connection with their usual and ordinary meaning in connection with the result sought to be obtained. The Constitution was divided into articles dealing with particular subjects. By no construction could this provision be regarded as limiting the plenary power given the Senate over the qualifications of its Members as provided in Article II. It had no connection with the qualifications of any person claiming to be elected to the Senate. These words—merely refer to the system provided for in the Constitution of two Senators from each State, however large or however small the State might be. If that provision had referred to the question of qualifications, it would have been put back in Article I, section 5.

As we all know, there had been a great fight in the Constitutional Convention over how the Senate should be created. There were some who believed that the States ought to elect Senators according to population, just as they elect Members of the House. Others thought that the larger States should be given a certain number of Senators and the smaller States a smaller number of Senators. There were many plans suggested; but finally, in a compromise, it was determined to give each State two Senators, regardless of the size of the State. This provision in Article V had only to do with that question, and then only in case of amendments to the Constitution. I doubt if a single person in the convention ever dreamed that the provision in Article V—would ever be used as an argument to limit the Senate's absolute and plenary power to pass upon the qualifications of its Members in such way as it might see fit.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In connection with the words "plenary power," I wanted to invite the Senator's attention——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator can invite my attention to the matter in just a minute, when I have finished what I have to say on this particular matter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will not trouble the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. In all the discussion about equal State representation in the Constitutional Convention—and there was a large amount of discussion about it—the question of qualifications of Senators did not arise in that connection. The question of qualifications arose in an entirely different way.

That the provision in Article 5 "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate" has no bearing on this question is perfectly apparent from our history, for many times since our Government was founded has a State been deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

For instance, the State of Wyoming from 1891 to 1893 had only one Senator here. The Legislature of Wyoming was not able to agree; and that splendid Senator who had formerly represented it, our beloved colleague, Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN, and who has represented it ever since 1893, was not here. The failure of the Wyoming Legislature to elect a Senator during those two years did not have the slightest connection with the provision in Article V providing for amendments to the Constitution. I recall also that Tennessee, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and a great number of other States in the not far distant past had only one Senator here because of the failure of legislatures to elect. In the one case the legislature failed to elect. In this case the two States in question elected men whose qualifications the Senate, under its plenary power, was unwilling to accept. In neither case does the provision of Article V apply. If that article applied in the way that is now argued, the two Senators must always be here to represent that State. If a Senator should die, the State must have another man right here at the instant to take his place. If one were ill, the State would have to have an alternate Senator to put in his place. It would be not only a difficult but practically an impossible provision, if the rule were laid down that every State must have two Senators here always representing it, or otherwise such State would be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. Of course, the Constitution makers had no such situation in their minds. The provision that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," had solely and alone to do with the enactment of amendments to the Constitution, and constituted no kind of limitation, express or implied, on the Senate's plenary power, given by the Constitution in terms, to judge of the qualifications of its Members.

Mr. President, I may add that I think the power that is going to be exercised in this case and in the Vare case is a very large power and ought not to be exercised except under the most certain conditions and when there can be no reasonable doubt about the facts justifying the exercise of the power. The facts in the case of Mr. SMITH are perfectly certain. His disqualifications are not only shown by the proof, but he himself admits by his position in the case that those disqualifications exist. Under those circumstances, believing as I do that the Constitution gives this body absolute and plenary power over the qualifications of its Members, and it not being disputed as a matter of fact that Mr. SMITH has been guilty of violating the Illinois law in securing very large contributions from those concerns which it was his duty as commerce commissioner to regulate, and that his nomination and consequent election were obtained by corrupt means, with which wrong-doing he has been charged here, there is, as it seems to me, but one thing for a Senator under his oath to do, and that is to vote for this resolution denying to Mr. SMITH a seat in the Senate. I shall so vote.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I regard the presence of a corrupt Senator in this body as a real menace to the Republic. Had the Committee on Privileges and Elections—or, for that matter, any other committee duly appointed to act by the Senate—made the report that this committee has made, and had the facts contained in that report been uncontroverted, I should have voted, after the Senator had been allowed to take his seat, to declare the Illinois seat vacant. I can not, however, subscribe to the procedure that is now being followed, which prevents a Senator who comes to us with properly attested credentials under the Constitution from taking his seat in the Senate; and I therefore must vote against this resolution.

TAX REDUCTION

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if any other Senators desire to discuss the pending resolution, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate. Otherwise, I wish to discuss another matter.

For the past two years there has been much talk in the country about tax reduction. We have seen surpluses piled up in the Treasury, but the Congress has been derelict in absorbing these surpluses by releasing the taxpayers from the burdens.

During the last Congress we attempted to pass some tax-reduction legislation, but we were thwarted in our attempt by the majority of this body. No one dreamed, however, that this Congress would convene without the immediate consideration of real tax-reduction legislation. It is quite true that that impression gathered some force because of the utterances of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate. From his home out in Utah, following the adjournment of Congress, when he had joined others in the defeat of a tax reduction bill, evidently after hearing from his constituents he gave out statements from Salt Lake City stating that he favored this Congress taking up the question and settling it immediately.

I have before me some newspaper clippings of what the Senator from Utah said on various occasions with reference to tax reduction.

On July 10 of last year, from Salt Lake City, he gave out a statement carried in the New York Times, headed "SMOOT for tax cut of $300,000,000." This item reads:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, July 6.—Senator REED SMOOT, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, fixes at $300,000,000 the reduction in the Nation's annual revenue that should be permitted by decrease in tax levies.

The Senator is inclined to "point with pride" to a Treasury surplus at the close of the fiscal year of about $600,000,000, but any reduction in taxes, he insists, must be made in the light of knowledge of what that surplus consists.

He points to various elements going into the Nation's revenue * * *.

He urges that there should be some margin of safety since lean years may follow fat years in business.

Then, on July 22 the New York Times carried an article under the headline:

SMOOT again asks Coolidge to call a special session.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not ask the President for an extra session.

Mr. HARRISON. I am only quoting from the New York Times, which is a very reputable newspaper.

Mr. SMOOT. I never asked President Coolidge for an extra session, never had it in my mind, and therefore the statement is not correct.

Mr. HARRISON. This article states that the Senator was invited down to Black Hills, and was going to confer with the President, and might talk about tax reduction at that time, although it says that he thinks it is only a social call. He went, and from Rapid City, S. Dak., is this item carried in the New York Times, headed:

SMOOT again asks Coolidge to call a special session.

Where that newspaper correspondent got the information I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. Neither do I.

Mr. HARRISON. The correspondent was at Rapid City, S. Dak. Senator SMOOT had made a hurried social call out to see the President in the Black Hills, and this paper makes what it alleges to be a quotation from Senator SMOOT. The article states:

Senator SMOOT, of Utah, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, arrived at President Coolidge's lodge to-day and, after a brief conference with the President, reiterated his demand for a special session of Congress and outlined his taxation-revision program.

"In my opinion an extra session of Congress not later than November 1 is absolutely necessary if the flood sufferers are to obtain prompt and adequate relief at a time when they should have it," Senator SMOOT said. "Since reading what Secretary Hoover said about the needs of the farmers in the South after November 1, there seems to me pressing need for calling Congress into special session long in advance of the regular session in December."

The Senator's taxation-revision plan provides for a cut of $300,000,000, including the following reductions.

"It will be physically impossible for Congress to enact a tax revision bill in time to make the reductions effective March 15, when the first payments are required, unless there is a special session. I foresee some difficulties in getting a tax bill through even by that time, should Congress convene in special session a month or six weeks before the regular December session.

"I feel that the minority Members will not prevent the enactment of the deficiency bill and flood relief by dilatory methods, but after these are out of the way partisan politics over the seating of the two Senators from Illinois and Pennsylvania is sure to occupy the attention of the Senate for a very long time."

Further on he reiterates those views, and on August 27, in an article dated Salt Lake City, the Senator said:

All parties agree that the corporations should have this delayed relief, but we may expect, of course, some political vaporizing when the question comes up for action.

Everything the Senator said last summer, while he was in close touch with the people, was to the effect that tax reduction should come quickly and speedily, and, as suggested in these news items, that the Congress should be convened at least November 1, so that the tax bill could be taken up and passed.

Well, the Secretary of the Treasury expressed the opinion that there should not be any tax reduction until after March 15. The Senator had a talk with him, I presume, if the newspapers carry the truth, and he has changed his opinion about the $300,000,000 tax reduction, and now, I believe, he says that the papers quote him correctly that it ought not to be as large as the bill that passed the House, which carried some $290,000,000.

Mr. President, I have read these quotations to show, I will not say hypocrisy, because that is too strong a word, but to show how quickly the Senator from Utah can change his mind. We got an inkling last week of what might happen in the Finance Committee, because the Senator said that the Republicans on the committee would line up against reporting out this tax reduction bill. This morning we met and had a vote. Nine Democratic members of the Finance Committee voted for the immediate consideration of that bill. Eleven Republican members of the committee, all of them, voted against the consideration of the tax reduction bill.

I am wondering what has come over the vision and the dreams of the distinguished Senator from Utah. When are we to have tax reduction? The Senator in the summer said it must pass before March 15 in order to give the relief. Now, he wants to wait until after March 15, and perhaps then there will be some other excuse offered to prevent any tax reduction at all.

Mr. President, I want to read, merely for the RECORD, some figures as to the condition of the Treasury, because no doubt the Senator will rise in his august majesty and say that we will know more about the condition of the Treasury March 15 than we know now. I want to read a statement of the estimates of the Treasury Department of the surpluses for the past seven years or more, and then the figures of the actual revenue that came in, to show the great difference between the estimates of the Treasury Department and the real facts.

In 1922 the estimate of the surplus was $24,468,000. The actual surplus was $313,000,000, nearly $300,000,000 more than the estimated surplus.

In 1923 the estimate of the surplus was $273,000,000. The actual surplus was $309,000,000.

In 1924 the estimate of the surplus was $329,000,000. The actual surplus was $505,000,000.

In 1925 the estimate of the surplus was $67,000,000. The actual surplus was $250,000,000.

In 1926 the estimate of the surplus was $262,000,000. The actual surplus turned out to be $377,000,000.

In 1927 the estimate was $383,000,000. The actual surplus was $635,000,000.

This year the estimate is $454,000,000. The tax reduction bill as it passed the House carried only about $294,000,000, and I submit we have enough facts to show that the American people are entitled to a reduction of taxes, with the surplus accumulations as large as they are now, and I submit that the country will not indorse what the distinguished Senator and his colleagues have done, and that we will be justified in going to extreme methods here to try to put this bill through.

The Senator's colleagues in the House thought this was of such tremendous importance that they agreed that the tax reduction bill which is before the Senate Finance Committee was to be called "House Bill No. 1," so that it should go to the country that the first legislation considered by this Congress was a tax reduction measure. Now they have sidestepped and have gone back on the proposition.

MEMORIAL TO THE WOMEN OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress an appropriation was authorized in the amount of $150,000 for the building by the Red Cross of a war memorial to the women of the United States who participated in the World War. The condition was that no appropriation was to be made until $300,000 had been raised. Already $480,000 has been raised, which is about $170,000 more than had been agreed upon. However, the lowest bid for the memorial is $530,000. This means that about $90,000 must be made up yet; $150,000 more than the women have agreed upon has already been contributed.

In view of what I have stated, I report from the Committee on the Library Senate Joint Resolution 66, authorizing an additional appropriation of $50,000, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate receive the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on the Library. Is there objection?

Mr. GERRY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio how much of an increase this would involve.

Mr. FESS. The original appropriation was $150,000. The Red Cross made collections to that amount, making the total fund $300,000. There was to be no payment of any money until $300,000 was raised. That has been raised and $150,000, in addition, by the Red Cross. They have $480,000. The lowest bid for the memorial is $530,000, the highest bid being something over $600,000. The women agreed to proceed to raise the $90,000 additional if we would make up $50,000. They have already raised $170,000 more than was agreed upon.

Mr. GERRY. Has the joint resolution been agreed upon by the committee?

Mr. FESS. Yes; unanimously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senate receiving the report? The Chair hears none, and the report is received.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) authorizing an additional appropriation to be used for the memorial building provided for by a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War," approved June 7, 1924, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is authorized to be appropriated, in addition to the sum authorized to be appropriated by a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War," approved June 7, 1924, the sum of $50,000 to be used for the erection and equipment of the memorial building provided for by such joint resolution. Such sum shall be expended under the direction of the commission, consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library and the chairman of the House Committee on the Library, created by such joint resolution, and its disbursement shall not be contingent upon any private subscription.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 17, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William S. Abernethy, D. D., pastor of the Calvary Baptist Church, offered the following prayer:

Our Father above, we bow in gratitude before Thee this morning. Thou art the giver of every good and perfect gift. All that we have and are we owe to Thee. The gold and the silver are Thine, the cattle upon the hills are Thine, and we are but stewards from whom an accounting will be asked. Grant that we may be good stewards. We ask that wisdom may be granted so that the various questions that may arise this day may be successfully dealt with. May we be patient, courageous, just, brotherly, and so may we to-day do honor to Thee, our Maker, our Preserver, our Friend; and all this we humbly ask in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT COOLIDGE BEFORE THE PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by the President of the United States, delivered before the Pan American Conference at Habana, Cuba, on January 16, 1928.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address recently delivered by the President. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of President Coolidge before the Pan American Conference, Habana, Cuba, January 16, 1928:

Mr. President and members of the Pan American Conference, no citizen of any of the Americas could come to the queen of the islands of the West Indies without experiencing an emotion of gratitude and reverence. These are the outposts of the new civilization of the Western Hemisphere. It was among them that the three small ships of the heroic admiral came when, with the assistance and support of Spain, Columbus presented to Europe the first widespread, public, and authoritative knowledge of the New World. Other points may have been previously visited, but for these was reserved the final revelation. The great discoverer brought with him the seed of more republics, the promise of greater human freedom, than ever crossed the seas on any other voyage. With him sailed immortal declarations of independence and great charters of self-government. He laid out a course that led from despotism to democracy. Edward Everett Hale, a seer of New England, tells us that this gallant seaman who rose above the storms to become the forerunner of an age of pioneers,

> "Left blood and guilt and tyranny behind,
> Sailing still west the hidden shore to find;
> For all mankind that unstained scroll unfurled,
> Where God might write anew the story of the world."

In the spirit of Christopher Columbus all of the Americas have an eternal bond of unity, a common heritage bequeathed to us alone. Unless we together redeem the promise which his voyage held for humanity, it must remain forever void. This is the destiny which Pan America has been chosen to fulfill.

As we look back over the accomplishments of the past four centuries we can see that we are warranted in asserting that the Western Hemisphere has not failed in the service that it seemed destined to render to humanity. Progress does not go forward in a straight line. It is a succession of waves. We can not always ride on their crest, but among our republics the main tide of human advancement has been steadily rising. The people have taken charge of their own affairs. In spite of some temporary discouragements, they have on the whole been successful. The fertility of a virgin soil, a wealth of mineral deposits, an abundance of water power, a multitude of navigable rivers, all at the command of a resourceful people, have produced a material prosperity greater in amount and more widely distributed than ever before fell to the lot of the human race. The arts and sciences have flourished, the advantages of education are widespread, devotion to religion is marked by its sincerity. The spirit of liberty is universal. An attitude of peace and good will prevails among our nations. A determination to adjust differences among ourselves, not by a resort to force, but by the application of the principles of justice and equity, is one of our strongest characteristics. The sovereignty of small nations is respected. It is for the purpose of giving stronger guaranties to these principles, of increasing the amount and extending the breadth of these blessings, that this conference has been assembled.

The very place where we are meeting is a complete demonstration of the progress we are making. Thirty years ago Cuba ranked as a foreign possession, torn by revolution and devastated by hostile forces. Such government as existed rested on military force. To-day Cuba is her own sovereign. Her people are independent, free, prosperous, peaceful, and enjoying the advantages of self-government. The last important area has taken her place among the republics of the New World. Our fair hostess has raised herself to a high and honorable position among the nations of the earth. The intellectual qualities of the Cuban people have won for them a permanent place in science, art, and literature, and their production of staple commodities has made them an important factor in the economic structure of the world. They have reached a position in the stability of their government, in the genuine expression of their public opinion at the ballot box, and in the recognized soundness of their public credit that has commanded universal respect and admiration. What Cuba has done, others have done and are doing.

It is a heavy responsibility which rests upon the people and the governments represented at this conference. Unto them has been given a new land, free from the traditional jealousies and hatreds of the Old World, where the people might come into the fullest state of development. It is among the republics of this hemisphere that the principle of human rights has had its broadest application; where political freedom and equality and economic opportunity have made their greatest advance. Our most sacred trust has been, and is, the establishment and expansion of the spirit of democracy. No doubt we shall make some false starts and experience some disappointing reactions. But we have put our confidence in the ultimate wisdom of the people. We believe we can rely on their intelligence, their honesty, and their character. We are thoroughly committed to the principle that they are better fitted to govern themselves than anyone else is to govern them. We do not claim immediate perfection. But we do expect continual progress. Our history reveals that in such expectation we have not been disappointed. It is better for the people to make their own mistakes than to have some one else make their mistakes for them.

Next to our attachment to the principle of self-government has been our attachment to the policy of peace. When the Republics of the Western Hemisphere gained their independence, they were compelled to fight for it. They have always been a brave, resolute, and determined people, willing to make any sacrifices to defend what they believed to be their rights. But when once their rights have been secured, they have been almost equally solicitous to respect the rights of others. Their chief efforts have been devoted to the arts of peace. They have never come under the delusion of military grandeur. Nowhere among these Republics have greater military establishments ever been maintained for the purpose of overawing or subjugating other nations. We have all nourished a commendable sentiment of moderate preparation for national defense, believing that for a nation to be unreasonably neglectful of the military art, even if it did not invite and cause such aggression as to result either in war or in abject humiliation, it must finally lead to a disastrous disintegration of the very moral fiber of the nation. But it is one thing to be prepared to defend our rights as a last extremity and quite another to rely on force where reason ought to prevail. The form of our governments guarantees us against the Old World dynastic wars. It is scarcely too much to say that the conflicts which have been waged by our Republics for 150 years have been almost entirely for the purpose of securing independence and extending the domain of human freedom. When these have been accomplished, we have not failed to heed the admonition to beat our swords into plowshares.

We have kept the peace so largely among our Republics because democracies are peace loving. They are founded on the desire to promote the general welfare of the people, which is seldom accomplished by warfare. In addition to this, we have adopted a spirit of accommodation, good will, confidence, and mutual helpfulness. We have been slow to anger and plenteous in mercy. When this attitude prevails it is not difficult to find practical means of adjusting differences. The statesmanship of the southern American Republics has shown a peculiar skill and aptitude in this field. It began with mutual consultation. The first Pan American Congress assembled at Panama City about 100 years ago. The purpose of that gathering has never been forgotten, and it may be said to have marked the beginning of a permanent institution. The Republics south of the Rio Grande have produced a most impressive record of a resort to mediation, arbitration, and other peaceful methods of the adjustment and adjudication of their international differences. A study of their treaties will disclose some of the finest examples of mutual covenants for the limitation of armaments and the avoidance of hostile conflict. In the discovery of the true principles of international relations, and in the practical ability of putting them into effect, they have demonstrated a moral power and strength of character for which the whole world should be profoundly grateful.

The Pan American conferences meet for the purpose of maintaining and extending these important principles. It is impossible to conceive of a more inspiring motive which men could entertain in dealing with the affairs of this world. You have convened to take counsel together for increasing the domestic welfare of the free people of our independent Republics and promoting international peace. No other part of the world could provide constituencies which all have such a unity of purpose. The whole atmosphere of the conference is animated with the spirit of democracy and good will. This is the fundamental concept of your organization. All nations here represented stand on an exact footing of equality. The smallest and the weakest speaks here with the same authority as the largest and the most powerful. You come together under the present condition, and the future expectation, of profound peace. You are continuing to strike a new note in international gatherings by maintaining a forum in which not the selfish interests of a few but the general welfare of all will be considered.

If you are to approximate your past successes, it will be because you do not hesitate to meet facts squarely. We must consider not only our strength but our weaknesses. We must give thought not only to our excellence but to our defects. The attitude of the open mind must prevail. Most of all, you must be guided by patience, tolerance, and charity, judging your sister nations not only by their accomplishments, but also by their aspirations. A Divine Providence has made us a neighborhood of Republics. It is impossible to suppose that it was for the purpose of making us hostile to each other, but from time to time to reveal to us the methods by which we might secure the advantages and blessings of enduring friendships.

Like the subjects which have occupied the attention of your predecessors, the topics contained in the agenda of the present conference call for cooperative international action. They belong to the class of inquiries that produce closer international relations, promoting the good of all in the political, economic, social, and cultural spheres. Your predecessors have shown great wisdom in directing their attention to the matters that unite and strengthen us in friendly collaboration—subjects that develop an inter-American unity of sentiment which alone can make our common endeavors fruitful.

The existence of this conference, held for the consideration of measures of purely American concern, involves no antagonism toward any other section of the world or any other organization. It means that the independent Republics of the Western Hemisphere, animated by the same ideals, enjoying the common blessings of freedom and peace, realize that there are many matters of mutual interest and importance which can best be investigated and resolved through the medium of such friendly contact and negotiation as is necessary for cooperative action. We realize that one of the most important services which we can render to humanity, the one for which we are peculiarly responsible, is to maintain the ideals of our Western World. That is our obligation. No one else can discharge it for us. If it is to be met, we must meet it ourselves. We must join together in assuring conditions under which our Republics will have the freedom and the responsibility of working out their own destiny in their own way.

The proceedings of the successive Pan American conferences reveal a record of achievement which, without attempting the spectacular, constantly builds on the solid foundation of the immediately attainable. With each succeeding conference the agreements for the orderly settlement of such differences as may arise between the American Republics have been extended and strengthened, thus making their relationship more certain and more secure. Each conference has contributed its share toward developing more intimate cultural ties among the nations of this hemisphere, and establishing new currents of mutual understanding. Obstacles to closer economic relations have been removed, thus clearing the pathways of commercial intercourse.

Of scarcely less importance have been the many special conferences which from time to time have assembled for the purpose of dealing with the more technical questions in the relations between the Republics of America. The meetings of the International Commission of Jurists, the Pan American Highway Conferences, the Child Welfare Conferences, the Sanitary Conferences, the Conference on Consular Procedure, the Scientific Congresses, the Financial Conferences, the Red Cross Conferences, and the highly important and significant Congress of Journalists have all served to strengthen that spirit of Pan American solidarity which, in the last analysis, represents one of the greatest achievements of our American civilization and one which, in the future, is destined to play so important a part in the fulfillment of the high mission intrusted to the Republics of this hemisphere.

It has been most gratifying to witness the increasing interchange of university professors and the constantly growing stream of student migration from one country to another. No other influence can be more potent and effective in promoting mutual comprehension of national aims and ideals. It is sincerely to be hoped that this cultural interchange will with each year assume larger proportions.

It is not desirable that we should attempt to be all alike. Progress is not secured through uniformity and similarity but rather through multiplicity and diversity. We should all be intent on maintaining our own institutions and customs, preserving the purity of our own language and literature, fostering the ideals of our own culture and society. In a territory reaching from the north temperate zone through the Tropics to the South Pole, there is room enough for every worthy activity which is profitable and every ideal which is good. Our geographical location, as well as our political ideals, has endowed us with a self-contained unity and independence. Instead of considering our variations as an obstacle, we ought to realize that they are a contribution to harmonious political and economic relations.

In this great work of furthering inter-American understanding, a large responsibility rests upon the press of all countries. In our present stage of civilization, knowledge of foreign people is almost wholly supplied from that source. By misinterpreting facts, or by carelessness in presenting them in their true light, much damage can be done. While great progress has been made toward the publication of fuller information and unbiased views, a better exchange of news service would do much to promote mutual knowledge and understanding. What happens in this hemisphere is of more vital interest to all of us than what happens across any of the oceans.

An increase of information depends largely on an increase in the means of communication. During the entire nineteenth century intercourse between the American Republics was exceedingly difficult, and this isolation proved a serious obstacle to closer understanding. The twentieth century, however, and especially the last 10 years, have witnessed astonishing changes in this respect. Transportation by water has become rapid, comfortable, and relatively inexpensive. Shipping facilities from the United States have been largely improved. Our Government is greatly interested in increasing their efficiency. Railway lines have been extended so that it will soon be possible to travel with practically no interruption from the northern border of the United States to the southern border of El Salvador, and in South America from Peru to Patagonia. During very recent years every government of this hemisphere has been giving special attention to the building of highways, partly with a view to establishing feeders to the railway lines, but also to provide great arteries of inter-American communication for motor transport. On the wall of my office hangs a map showing proposed highways connecting the principal points of our two continents.

I am asking the United States Congress to authorize sending engineering advisers, the same as we send military and naval advisers, when requested by other countries, to assist in road building. These gratifying changes are about to be supplemented by the establishment of aviation routes, primarily for the transportation of mails, which will afford to our Republics a channel of interchange which will find its ultimate expression in closer cultural and commercial ties and in better mutual comprehension. Our Congress also has under consideration proposals for supporting such air routes. Citizens of the United States are considering installing them.

Private organizations of a civic, cultural, and educational character also have a great opportunity to help in the development of a closer understanding amongst the nations of America. The fine cooperation of the Red Cross Societies of the American Continents is an outstanding instance of the field for service open to the civic and philanthropic organizations of this hemisphere.

In the domain of commercial relations the last few years have witnessed an extraordinary strengthening of the economic ties binding together our Republics. In both agricultural and industrial production the countries of America are now complementing one another to an unusual degree, resulting in an increasing exchange of commodities. Furthermore, recent years have witnessed a most gratifying rise in the standards of living of the wage earners throughout the Americas. They enjoy a greater productive and earning capacity, with a consequent increase in their purchasing power which has been reflected in the growing volume of inter-American commerce, destined to become more and more important as it combines a scientific utilization of natural resources with an increasing economic power of the masses of the people. The greater a nation becomes in wealth and production the more it has for the service of its neighbors, the larger its markets for the goods of others. The operation of natural forces, supplemented by the conscious purpose of the governments and peoples of the Americas, has increased their mutual interest in each other and strengthened the commercial ties among them.

In this work of inter-American cooperation an important part has been played by the Pan American Union. It stands as the permanent organ of these conferences. This international organization has labored unceasingly to give effect to the treaties and resolutions adopted by the successive conferences. Its scope of usefulness is constantly being enlarged and its ability to serve the American Republics is strengthened with each year that passes.

In the area of political relations the results have been no less gratifying and even more significant. It is almost impossible fully to appreciate the remarkable record achieved by the Republics of America in the settlement of the differences that have arisen among them. Because of ill-defined boundaries of the sparsely settled political subdivisions of the old Spanish colonial empire, the independent States of America carved out of it fell heir to a large number of territorial disputes which, in many cases, were of an exceedingly delicate and difficult nature. It is a tribute to the spirit of good will and mutual accommodation which has dominated the relations among the nations of the Western World that most of these disputes have been settled by the orderly process of negotiation, mediation, and arbitration. The adjustment of international differences on the American Continents has happily advanced to a stage at which but few questions remain unsolved. This extraordinary record of achievement places heavy responsibility upon the present generation to advance the great work that has been so auspiciously begun.

It is a high example that we have set for the world in resolving international differences without resort to force. If these conferences mean anything, they mean the bringing of all our people more definitely and more completely under the reign of law. After all, it is in that direction that we must look with the greatest assurance for human progress. We can make no advance in the realm of economics, we can do nothing for education, we can accomplish but little even in the sphere of religion until human affairs are brought within the orderly rule of law. The surest refuge of the weak and the oppressed is in the law. It is preeminently the shield of small nations. This is necessarily a long, laborious process, which must broaden out from precedent to precedent, from the general acceptance of principle to principle. New activities require new laws. The rules for the governing of aviation are only beginning to be considered. We shall make more progress in the end if we proceed with deliberation. No doubt you will find in your discussions many principles that you are ready to announce as sound and settled rules of action. But there are certain to be other questions concerning which it is not possible at the present time to lay down a specific rule of law. This need not discourage anyone. It is rather the most conclusive evidence that the results which have been secured are not of a temporary and ill-considered nature, but a mature statement of sound and conclusive principles.

The founders of our Republics sought no peculiar preferment for themselves. That same disinterested spirit which has animated the conduct of our past conferences has given the American family of nations a high place in the opinion of the world. Our Republics seek no special privileges for themselves, nor are they moved by any of those purposes of domination and restraints upon liberty of action which in other times and places have been fatal to peace and progress. In the international system which you represent the rights of each nation carry with them corresponding obligations, defined by laws which we recognize as binding upon all of us. It is through the careful observance of these laws which define our rights and impose our duties that international cooperation is possible. This lays on us all a continental responsibility which none of us wish to avoid and the fulfillment of which is one of the most important guaranties of international friendship.

While the law is necessary for the proper guidance of human action, and will always remain the source of freedom and liberty and the ultimate guaranty of all our rights, there is another element in our experience which must always be taken into consideration. We read that "The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life." Oftentimes in our international relationship we shall have to look to the spirit rather than to the letter of the law. We shall have to realize that the highest law is consideration, cooperation, friendship, and charity. Without the application of these there can be no peace and no progress, no liberty, and no republic. These are the attributes that raise human relationships out of the realm of the mechanical, above the realm of animal existence, into the loftier sphere that borders on the divine. If we are to experience a new era in our affairs, it will be because the world recognizes and lives in accordance with this spirit. Its most complete expression is the golden rule.

The light which Columbus followed has not failed. The courage that carried him on still lives. They are the heritage of the people of Bolivar and of Washington. We must lay our voyage of exploration toward complete understanding and friendship. Having taken that course, we must not be turned aside by the fears of the timid, the counsels of the ignorant, or the designs of the malevolent. With law and charity as our guides, with that ancient faith which is only strengthened when it requires sacrifices, we shall anchor at last in the harbor of justice and truth. The same Pilot which stood by the side of the great discoverer, and the same Wisdom which instructed the founding fathers of our Republics, will continue to abide with us.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 38) giving and granting consent to an amendment to the constitution of the State of New Mexico, providing a method for executing leases and other contracts for the development and production of any and all minerals on lands granted or confirmed to said State by the act of Congress approved June 20, 1910, and to the enactment of such laws and regulations as may be necessary to carry said amendment into effect if it is adopted, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 52

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive, and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such excessive rates, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all;

Resolved further, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

SENATE TARIFF RESOLUTION

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what reference it is proposed to make of the message from the Senate urging tariff reduction?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it does not require any action in the House or any reference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that motion is in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I suggest that nobody has made a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair himself makes the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, seriously, what becomes of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is merely a notification from the Senate and requires no reference at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May we have it read?

The SPEAKER. It has been read.

Mr. TILSON. It was read in full.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; it was read by title.

The SPEAKER. The entire resolution was read, so the Chair understands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the matter lie on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands there is no need for any reference whatever.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is in mid-air, then?

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands. The document is in the possession of the Clerk and therefore of the House, and it is spread upon the Journal.

Mr. BLANTON. It will remain in the hip pocket of the Speaker, technically.

Mr. TILSON. It is the same as though the Speaker were absent and we elected a Speaker pro tempore while he was away. We would notify the Senate, and so they have notified us, by a message, of some action they have taken.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the international bankers of New York who want to open up the markets of America to foreign goods.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that motion is in order.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then the Chair takes the position that this resolution can not be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or to the Ways and Means Committee or to any other body and that the House has no control over it whatever?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be referred to any committee under the rules. Only such messages and portions of messages as require action by the House can be referred to committees under the precedents. There is no rule of the House under which this document may be referred to a committee. The Chair thinks that it comes to the House in the same manner and subject to the same disposition as messages relating to the organization of the Senate, which are merely received and spread upon the Journal.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This is the first time in the history of my service here or in any other body where a matter came into the House of Representatives and it was held that the House did not have some control over it; that it is a sacred document which can not be reached by the House of Representatives in any way whatever. I do not understand the philosophy of such a rule. If the Senate sends a piece of paper to this House or if the Legislature of the State of Texas or the people of the city of Cincinnati send a petition to this House, the position taken by the Chair is that if the House itself desires to take such petitions and refer them to a committee of the House, that the House itself has no right to do it under the rules of the House of Representatives. I do not understand the philosophy of that.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is the trouble?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. CAREW. I withdraw the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may have a parliamentary precedent here I renew my motion that this resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. It is simply a Senate resolution not requiring or even requesting the concurrence of the House. It states in the resolution that a copy of it shall be sent to the House of Representatives. It is not a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution and certainly it is not a House resolution. These three are the only kinds of resolutions known in the practice of this House.

The SPEAKER. In order that there may be no doubt as to what the resolution provides, the Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Resolution 52

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive, and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such excessive rates, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all.

Resolved further, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I presume the Chair will sustain the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this motion is not in order in connection with a Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to lay the appeal on the table. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced he was in doubt.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, we may just as well have the yeas and nays at the start. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 164, not voting 87, as follows:

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CULLEN reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill just reported, and pending that motion I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York with respect to time.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for several hours' time, and I was wondering if it would be satisfactory to the chairman if we could run along in general debate and then probably later fix a time?

Mr. WOOD. That is the very suggestion I was going to make to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TILSON. Will the two gentlemen agree as to division of time and the control of time?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; I would suggest that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by myself and the other by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that general debate be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

TAX REDUCTION

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I be not interrupted until I have concluded my statement; then if I have any time I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of the few years it has been my privilege to be a Member of this House I have heard numerous speeches, many of them to my mind very laudible in their purpose, many of them absolutely truthful and correct, but some of them containing misstatements.

There was a speech made on this floor yesterday which it seems to me outranks anything I have known to take place here for absolute misstatements of fact. I refer to the speech made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in relation to tax matters. In the course of that speech he sets down a very distinct defy, but before I touch on that I want to make this statement:

I realize the long and faithful service of the gentleman from Texas. I realize the rank he holds both in the House and on the important Ways and Means Committee, but I do not hesitate to say that I think the gentleman abuses his position in the House when he comes upon this floor and makes such statements as he did yesterday and expects the membership of the House to accept his statements as accurate, realizing that he is a man of great judgment and ability and of very high standing in the House.

He says he does not want to mislead anybody. "I do not want you [referring to the membership of the House] to be misled and I do not want the country to be misled."

Why, Mr. Chairman, that is the whole purpose of his speech, endeavoring to mislead the House and mislead the country. The papers of yesterday afternoon throughout the country bore in headlines the speech of the gentleman from Texas. That is exactly what he was endeavoring to do, to mislead the House and mislead the country. But he states in his plausible way that he has no intention of misleading anybody. I substitute "everybody," for that was his object, to mislead everybody.

What does he say about certain sections? He refers to section 141 and makes a prophecy that if section 141 of the revenue bill as passed by the House remains in the bill it will not be signed; then he goes on to say that the reason it will not be signed is because the Secretary of the Treasury happens to be interested in corporations, and that this is an anticorporation section.

Permit me to explain the situation briefly. Under the present law (section 240) corporations which are affiliated are permitted to file consolidated returns. The bill as reported by the Committee on Ways and Means contained two sections on this subject. Section 141 retains the provisions of the present law for the taxable years 1927 and 1928. The other section (section 118) contained a substitute for the consolidated-return provisions, to become effective after 1928. I assume that the gentleman from Texas is presenting the broad question as to whether or not consolidated corporations should be treated for tax purposes as separate entities and is not raising the issue between the provisions of the existing law and the provisions of the proposed substitute. Although his references to the sections of the bill are rather confusing and inaccurate, I assume that the gentleman from Texas has taken the position that all corporations should be treated as separate taxable entities. I am very glad indeed of the opportunity of meeting the gentleman upon this issue.

The gentleman from Texas was particularly anxious to bring about the elimination of section 118. He now goes so far as to say that the receipts of the Government will be increased by at least $50,000,000 in 1929 as the result of his amendment striking out section 118.

I want to predict—and my prediction is just as good as is that of the gentleman from Texas; you might say neither is worth a hurrah—I am not quite so conceited, as is the gentleman from Texas, as to claim that I can put up the financial argument to prove the mistakes he has used to mislead—but I make the prediction that the receipts with consolidated returns in the law will be exactly as large as they are if the privilege to file consolidated returns is repealed. That is my prediction.

The gentleman from Texas may have been trying to cut out what he considers the evils of consolidated returns, but let me predict, just as the gentleman did yesterday—only from a different angle—that if there is a reason for corporations to endeavor to make consolidated returns, they will so set up their business transactions in some way or other as to absolutely nullify the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] eliminating section 118. That is going to be the result, and you can not stop them from doing it, and I put my prophecy against his, that the revenue will not be increased by striking out section 118. On the contrary, there is danger of material loss in revenue by new methods of evasion.

Let me for a moment analyze the accuracy of the gentleman's statement that the elimination of the consolidated returns provisions will increase the revenues for 1929 by $50,000,000—and, Mr. Chairman, I invite attention to the fact that the gentleman from Texas has willingly risked his reputation upon the accuracy of his statement. The actual fact is that the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, striking section 118 from the bill, can not possibly be reflected in the revenues received until the fiscal year 1930, and the full effect will not be felt until the fiscal year 1931. The entire argument of the gentleman from Texas is based upon his statement that his amendment will produce $50,000,000 more revenue for 1929; that accordingly the bill as it passed the House reduced the taxes by $240,000,000 rather than by $290,000,000; and that consequently the slight increase in the reduction from the amount placed as the maximum by the Secretary of the Treasury can not possibly justify holding the tax bill up until March 15. Upon this reasoning the gentleman from Texas searches for some other cause for the delay. The provisions of section 141 will permit corporations paying taxes in the fiscal year 1929 to pay them upon the basis of consolidated returns. The gentleman from Texas must admit that his amendment can have no effect upon the 1929 revenues.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the worst indictment that I bring against the gentleman from Texas. The greater part of the speech of the gentleman yesterday was a personal attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a favorite theme of the gentleman from Texas. At every opportunity he seems to think a great benefit will come to the Democratic Party by calling attention to the fact that undoubtedly the Secretary of the Treasury pays a rather large income tax. He says in the course of his remarks that the reason that this bill will not become law is that it will add to Mr. Mellon's taxes. He does not want to mislead anybody. No, no! Give him credit for not trying to mislead—of course. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, is as wealthy as the gentleman from Texas makes him out to be—and I do not know the first thing about it, but I assume that the gentleman from Texas for once has made a correct statement, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is a wealthy man—he can afford to pay more taxes, and there will be no citizen more willing to do it than the Secretary of the Treasury. [Applause on the Republican side.] Oh, this effort on the part of some people to act as demagogues and make out that because a few people group themselves together and do business as a corporation and have a large capitalization, it is the ruination of the American people, and to endeavor to mislead the people into thinking that is true, is very, very irritating, and that is the situation we find ourselves in to-day. That is the situation that has brought about such an attack as the gentleman from Texas made yesterday. He says he would bank his reputation—I think that is his language somewhere—on the accuracy of the statements that he makes. I am not going into details, but I want the House to know that one of the items in the tax bill as it came to the House reduced the tax on transfers of stock by 50 per cent—an item of $9,000,000. The gentleman from Texas yesterday said that because probably the Secretary of the Treasury owned some shares of stock, he was in favor of that reduction. As a matter of fact he opposed it, and every statement that has come to us, either to our committee or to the public in general, from the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody connected with the Treasury, has opposed the taking off of the excise tax on stock transfers. And still our great leader on the Democratic side of the great Ways and Means Committee does not want to mislead or to deceive anyone when he says that the Secretary of the Treasury favors making that reduction! The Secretary of the Treasury opposed it all of the way and all of the time.

There is another reference that should not be passed over in the very eloquent address of the gentleman from Texas—and by the way, it is a very great pleasure, let me say to the gentleman, to be favored the next morning after he makes his speech with a copy of his remarks in the RECORD, because often we have noticed that his remarks remain in his pocket or in his office until the subject matter has passed out of the minds of the people, and I think there are times on record when his remarks have not even ever been printed. It is, therefore, very gratifying to see his address in the RECORD this morning. I shall read to you now a paragraph from the gentleman's speech, and I have no doubt that later the gentleman from Texas will explain its meaning. Here it is:

> I can not go into the Treasury Department to find out how much losses they have had, which could not be charged against them if they had each one to make an individual return. But I do know this: I do know that one gentleman alone, whom many men in this House know, whom you all know and love and have confidence in, told me that the companies that he was associated with alone would pay nearly $5,000,000 more of taxes.

I have not the slightest idea whom the gentleman had in mind when he made that statement, but I do say this: The gentleman from Texas did want to carry the impression to the public, and particularly to the Members of this House, that that paragraph referred either to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, or to the Undersecretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills.

Mr. GARNER of Texas rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is so worded as to wish you gentlemen to infer——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts announced in the beginning that he did not want to be interrupted. I have not sought to interrupt him, although he made one statement in the beginning that was not correct; but now he is making a statement that is wholly incorrect, and I desire to call his attention to it at this time so that he may know before he takes his seat that the statement is not correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. That the gentleman made? I realize that, certainly.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman said the purpose I had in making that statement was to refer to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TREADWAY. To draw the inference that you were referring either to Mr. Mellon or to Mr. Mills, and I repeat it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. That is not correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. Who was it? You did not say who it was, but you wanted us to think it was either Mr. Mellon or Mr. Mills. I defy you to say who it was, for the benefit of the Members of the House. I know it was not either one of those gentlemen. I know that if they were called upon to pay their taxes they would not whine about it and they would not make a personal excuse for not paying them.

What an absurd situation we are in. I said at first, I will say to the gentleman, when I referred to that paragraph, that I did not know who you meant; but I know who you wanted us to think you meant, and I repeat, you wanted us to think it was either Mr. Mellon or Mr. Mills who would be affected to the extent of $5,000,000 of taxes by this present law.

Now there is another side to this corporation matter, and it will perhaps be time enough to discuss the merits of the question when we see whether the people are misled or not. But the gentleman, during the time when the bill was up for consideration here, argued in effect and made a very compelling argument and got enough votes to put it across, that a company having a selling agency must report in one return the profits from the sale; the same stockholders owning the manufacturing concern, and under the provision that the gentleman from Texas put into the bill by his leadership the group of men forming a selling company must report their profits as a separate item and pay taxes on it. But you can not put against those profits the cost of manufacturing.

That is what the gentleman's amendment to the tax bill did. Why take a man doing business in his individual capacity; John Smith does business in his own right, and in one place he manufactures, say, pocketknives. They make some up in our country. In one shop he manufactures pocketknives, and down the street he has a retail store where he sells them, and he has a wholesale agent out on the road to sell them. Do you mean to tell me that it is not common sense to allow that man to charge the cost of his production against the profits from his sales?

Now that explains in plain English the effect of depriving corporations of the right to make affiliated or joint consolidated returns. The gentleman does not refer now, and did not refer yesterday—and, of course, did not intend to mislead anybody—did not refer to the old law at all. Section 240 is the law to-day under which this consolidated return is permitted. He did not say that that was the present law.

Section 240 has been on the statute books for some time, and you would think that he had discovered a new cure of the tax ills of corporations when he speaks of this great bugaboo of consolidated returns.

Now, I want in closing to say just one further word, and that is with reference to the prophecy that the gentleman from Texas makes, that if section 141 remains in this bill, the bill will never become a law. It means increased taxes for Mr. Mellon; it is not tax revision, according to his viewpoint.

Now, there are drawbacks to the public service, serious drawbacks to the public service, and that is one of them. When a man on this floor assumes the rôle of a demagogue—I use the word with its full meaning—and endeavors to have it appear to the American people that a man holding such a responsible position as that of the Secretary of the Treasury would stand in the way of legislation which the people have enacted because of its personal effect on him and his finances, the man who makes that statement is a demagogue of the very worst type. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I hold no brief for the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not suppose I have spoken to him a dozen times in the period during which he has been Secretary. But it is fortunate that the opinion of the gentleman from Texas is not one that prevails among the public at large. The public knows that we are getting wonderful service, the very ablest of financial service, from the present Secretary of the Treasury. [Applause.] And when a gentleman like the gentleman from Texas comes on this floor and talks as a demagogue to this House and publishes in his speech the statement that such a man as Andrew W. Mellon would allow his private interests to take the place of his public duty, oh, it is too low demagoguism to bear. I get angry. But fortunately the Secretary of the Treasury has an even disposition, and he has stood that sort of abuse for a long time at the hands of certain gentlemen.

I think it is time that some of us stood on this floor and thanked such a public official as Andrew W. Mellon for the service performed for this country during the past few years. [Applause.] He took the Treasury at a time of great stress. He moved into that organization men that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I intended to say a little more about Mr. Mellon.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman from New Hampshire. This gentleman, Andrew W. Mellon, subordinated every bit of his personal wishes in accepting public office. What a retiring, reticent man he is! Until you know something about him you wonder as to his financial ability and acumen. But when you see the result of the way he has funded the debts of this country, and see the great service he has rendered to us all, you realize his greatness, you recognize his ability, and you know that he is too big a man to put any store whatsoever in such demagogic statements as were made about him on this floor yesterday by the gentleman from Texas. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] got up to speak he particularly asked that he be not interrupted during the 20 minutes he had. I do not blame him for making that request. I make no such request myself. His second statement was that he wanted to show that I had made a misstatement of fact on yesterday. I call to your attention that you can not find in his 25 or 26 minutes a single instance where he called your attention to any misstatement of fact I made. [Applause.] I wait for some gentleman in the audience to call attention to a single misstatement of fact I made and I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he wants to do so, to call attention to a single misstatement of fact I made yesterday. He has challenged no misstatement of fact; but he has challenged a conclusion I came to. Then he wound up by saying I made a demagogic speech. This is not the first time I have been charged with making a demagogic speech, and probably it will not be the last time; but that is the only charge that can be made against me when gentlemen can not answer the arguments I have made. [Applause.]

He said I made a certain statement about the Secretary of the Treasury. I have never yet made a statement that reflected upon his honor, but I have drawn conclusions that bore out human nature and the action of the Secretary of the Treasury for the last six or seven years, circumstantial evidence, human nature, which drove him to do certain things. That is the statement I made yesterday. I made the statement that Andrew Mellon, in the consideration of this bill, had a selfish interest and that that interest was being asserted to keep the tax bill from becoming a law. I repeat it to-day. [Applause.]

I heard a gentleman, when he was passing through here a few moments ago, say that a friend of his had made a statement which reminded him somewhat of the gentleman from Massachusetts and his action this morning. He said:

"My friend TREADWAY," to use an automobile expression, "has one of the largest hoods and the loudest horn with the least horsepower that I ever heard of in my life." [Laughter and applause.]

If the administration is to let the gentleman from Massachusetts defend its position on the floor of this House, I suggest to you that you must teach him something more than the philosophy he used this morning.

I stated certain facts yesterday, and I came to certain conclusions. He says the conclusions are erroneous. That is up to you to determine; but not a single fact that I stated yesterday has been contradicted. Some of them had to be drawn from conclusions. They could not be demonstrated entirely, but they are the best I could find.

The estimates I make are like the estimates the Treasury Department makes; they may be erroneous, but they are the best I could do, and I made them in good faith. Those estimates go to the essence of the question of tax reduction for the calendar year 1929. I said then, and I repeat now, that if you will pass the bill that we passed here, and which is pending before the Senate, you will not have a reduction of $200,000,000 in the calendar year 1929. If that is true, then, why do you not pass the bill? It is not the amount that prevents passage, I repeat, but it is the provisions in there that affect, unfortunately, we will say, the Secretary of the Treasury and those associated with him. I estimated yesterday it would cost the Secretary of the Treasury $1,000,000 more if section 141 remained in this bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not even know that section 118 was stricken out. [Applause.] He was speaking about it a moment ago as being in the bill. He does not know we struck it out in the House of Representatives. That is just about the way he is informed with respect to most subjects he discusses, and that is the reason my friend illustrated him as he did, because he does not seem to know what he is talking about.

Now, if that is true, if the total tax reduction for the calendar year 1929, when section 141 will go into force and effect, will be $200,000,000 or less, why do we not pass the bill? Secretary Mellon said it was all right to pass the bill we reported from the Ways and Means Committee with a reduction of $232,000,000, did he not? But we put on three amendments distasteful to the Secretary of the Treasury and distasteful to some of his associates even on the Republican side. One was the elimination of the automobile tax. They object to that because they want the principles of the sales tax left in the law. It is not the little money they are going to get out of it, but they want to retain the principle so that some of these days they can go to the American people and ask them to change from this iniquitous tax, as they term it, the estate tax or the income tax, and go to the sales tax, as Mr. Mellon and a number of his associates would like to do. Therefore they want the automobile tax left in the bill—even if it were as low as one-fourth of 1 per cent—so that that principle will be in the law.

Now, we permitted affiliated returns to be made when the excess-profits tax was in force and effect. It was right then. The excess-profits tax made it right and I can demonstrate it to anybody. The report that was made on it—and only one was made on it—was based on the excess-profits tax. But having got that favoritism and having got that advantage in paying taxes, Mr. Mellon and his associates, the large corporations, considered that it became a vested right, although they have no right under the present system to have that provision in the law.

We give them a discretion. They can make separate returns for each of their corporations if that is the best for them or they can consolidate them if that is the best for them. I said when I offered that amendment that it would take $25,000,000 more into the Treasury.

I said yesterday $50,000,000. Why did you not deny that? That was a statement of fact. You said you were going to show I made misstatements of facts. Show a misstatement of fact I made yesterday. There was not a single one, and I have yielded twice for the purpose of having one suggested.

Why does he not say that is not the fact? I will tell you why he does not say it. It may not be the fact, but that is the best I can estimate it, but Mr. Mellon does not want the subject investigated because he is afraid to agitate it. They do not want the American people to become advised about it. That is the reason he does not want it done. [Applause.]

You are afraid to challenge the statement I made yesterday that section 141 would cost Mr. Mellon $1,000,000 more in money than permitting consolidated returns. Why? The Secretary will tell you to leave it alone. The Secretary does not want that question investigated. The Secretary does not care anything about any more information on that than he can help.

I will not say who it was told me that certain associated corporations would pay $5,000,000 more. It was not the Secretary of the Treasury; it was not the Undersecretary of the Treasury, and I had no intention of conveying any such thought yesterday, and I say this as honestly as I ever spoke anything; but the gentleman who told me has the privileges of this House and he is identified with the Mellon interests. I will make it a little more specific, at least.

Now, gentlemen, I do not care about having a personal controversy about this matter. I would rather take up and discuss the principles involved and what is for the best interests of the country, and in order to do this I thought the other end of the Capitol should know what, in my judgment, was holding up this bill, or at least some associates over there should know this who feel the same way about tax reduction that I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I thank the gentleman, although I may not use that much time.

I wanted some gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol to understand what was being done.

How many Members of this House, both Democrats and Republicans, have heard from the corporations who want to continue double rendition? I would not be a bit surprised if out of the 435 Members at least 400 of you have been appealed to already to strike out the provisions of 141 from this bill.

I know I have heard a lot of colleagues on this side, as well as a few on the other side, say that they are already beginning to hear from them because they are coming to me and asking me about it. Pressure will be brought to bear upon you, the strongest pressure you can think of. Already from my home State two men, who are among the best friends I have, have been to Washington to see me about this provision, and neither of them ever owned enough stock in any corporation to be complaining about it; but they were good friends of mine and the corporations knew they could see John and might have some influence with him, and they were concerned about 141. They will bring this pressure to bear on every Member here, whether Republican or Democrat, because they hope to strike it out in the Senate, and if they can strike it out in the Senate and bring it back here and have your conferees agree to it, they will be happy and the bill will become a law. The Secretary of the Treasury will be happy and he will have accomplished what his associates and his advisers have asked him to do and what they believe in.

I have never attacked the Secretary's integrity. I have spoken of him in the highest terms, also of his human nature and the political thought that he has been preaching for 50 years, and have said that this has governed him in his office. Why should I not conclude this? For the last five or six years every circumstance has demonstrated it.

Take his recommendations to the Ways and Means Committee this year, for instance, and what do we find? Repeal of the estate tax. Interested? No; he is not interested. Reduction of the surtax. Interested? No; he is not interested; he pays no surtaxes.

If you had carried out his rates, and he had the audacity—to write in his recommendations specific rates—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] did not speak about it, but he ought to have done so. If I was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury had the audacity in his report urging tax reduction to write in rates, I think I would do like we did with respect to the Senate yesterday. I would send it back to him and tell him, "You must come down here with a more respectful and decent message instead of undertaking to tell the Congress of the United States what the rates should be." Go and get the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee and you will find that the Secretary of the Treasury not only suggested that the intermediate brackets be adjusted but he even had the audacity to send them down to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and say, "Here are the rates you ought to put in," something that was never done before, as I recall.

If you had adopted these rates, how much in taxes would this have benefited Mr. Mellon? The estimate is that it would have benefited those paying in excess of $100,000, $30,000,000. Those paying taxes in excess of $100,000 would have been benefited to the extent of $30,000,000, and those paying between $18,000 and $100,000, $20,000,000. So does Mr. Mellon pay below or above? Was it really to take the curve out of that line or was it for the benefit of the gentlemen who pay on above $100,000 of income? You can make your own deduction, and yet they say I charge him unjustly or in a demagogic way.

I give you the facts and you may draw your own conclusion. I say, and I think the facts justify it, that in making this recommendation he had a selfish interest; that when he recommended the repeal of the estate tax he was looking forward a little bit further with an estate of $500,000,000, part of which may have to go to the Treasury. I have the right to draw this deduction. The country draws this deduction, and it has the right to, because I have never seen any Secretary of the Treasury, and few Presidents even, that could disassociate from themselves either a lifetime of training or human nature. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] 15 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, some of the statements made by the gentleman from Texas would be amusing if their effects on the House, judging by the vote taken at the time the bill was under discussion, were not so serious. The gentleman says that no one can call attention to any misstatement he has made. I will not talk about misstatements, but I will have a few words to say with regard to statements that are just as far from what the real situations are as it is possible to get them.

I certainly have nothing personal to say with reference to the gentleman from Texas, but I do not know how in the world he can get so badly mistaken as he is with reference to some matters he has been talking about. I simply can not understand it at all, and it is a little difficult for me to make an argument on the proposition for that reason.

He tells you that the Secretary of the Treasury and the big corporations want section 141 out of the bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not say that, they want the provisions in section 141 stricken from 141. If they strike out those provisions consolidated returns will be permitted under the old law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is badly mistaken on that. Consolidated returns will not be permitted at all. Here is what the gentleman said yesterday with reference to the Secretary of the Treasury:

> Have you heard him say one word about section 141? I know that that is the thing that hurts him. I know how much loss a certain few companies took advantage of in the last year. Let somebody in the Treasury Department deny it. I do not imagine they will. They may not think that what I say is of sufficient importance to take notice of it; but nevertheless I make the statement to the country that if you will take out the graduated-tax principle, applying to small corporations and section 141, you will find that that is all that he is afraid of. He does not care for the $25,000,000 reduction.

There is no one that I know of unless it is the gentleman from Texas who wants section 141 taken out of the bill. In substance it simply provides that consolidated returns shall go on for two years more. Why? Why should anybody object to it?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the Senate strikes out section 141, will the gentleman sustain the House position?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know just what the House position is. I think the House did something it did not intend to do when it struck out section 118. I will not sustain striking out section 141, and that is what the gentleman is attacking the Secretary of the Treasury on. But the gentleman from Texas did not make such a motion in committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman in conference sustain the provisions of section 141 and seek to retain it in the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly I will. Section 141 is all right as far as it goes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And so will the gentleman from Texas when he gets around and thinks about it. Nobody objects to section 141.

Now, let us go into the substance, the meat of the matter. It is whether we will allow consolidated returns. Under section 141 they are permitted for two years longer, and then they are obliged to cease. That is this year and next year.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. No; January 1, 1929.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But they will make the returns for this year and next year under it, and that is the reason that I say it will be for two years more. I am absolutely accurate about this, and I will try to be accurate about everything I say.

Where do we get the provisions in reference to consolidated returns? The gentleman from Texas got to thinking about that matter to-day, and as he thought he got into a little different position than he had taken yesterday. The fact of the matter is the provision in relation to consolidated returns was put in the bill back in 1918. Who was Secretary of the Treasury at that time. Certainly it was not Andrew W. Mellon, for that was during Democratic days, and the Democrats put it in. It has been in the law ever since, and the gentleman from Texas voted for it in all the bills we have had passed since that time. He voted for it in different form—when we had the excess-profits tax and after we had the profit tax repealed nobody said a word against it. There was a good reason why they should not. Why was it put in? To prevent the evasion of taxes. So the Democratic leaders said at the time, and I agreed with them. It was absolutely necessary to prevent the evasion of taxes. If the Secretary of the Treasury can not require consolidated returns, it is the easiest thing in the world for corporations to evade the payment of taxes. Suppose we have two corporations, one of which made a large profit and holds it in the shape of physical property of some kind, it does not make any difference what it is, or even intangible property, for that matter. Suppose the corporation making the profit sells to one of its subsidiary corporations and makes a big loss on paper. If the Bureau of Internal Revenue can not require consolidated returns, that corporation can charge up that loss and the subsidiary company does not have to account for the profit. That is only one of the many ways in which these provisions can be used for the purpose of evading taxes. That is the reason why a provision preventing the evasion of taxes in this way was kept in the bill.

I think I may be permitted to state that I do not hold any brief for the Secretary of the Treasury. He has said nothing to me about this matter. In fact, he has said nothing to anybody about the provision for consolidated returns. Who got up this provision in the pending bill with reference to consolidated returns contained in section 118? The present law has a general provision in it with reference to consolidated returns. The provision in the bill was proposed by the advisory committee which was appointed by me. I shall assume the responsibility for that; but I have the word of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that I made good appointments on that committee. I think he said that I could not have selected any better, and I presume that he would stick by his statement. That advisory committee consisted of tax experts, men who were skilled in the business, men employed, of course, in some instances by big concerns and some not employed at all, like Mr. Thomas W. Page, who has a high reputation as an economist and does not hire out to anybody, except, I suppose, he gets a salary as president of the Economic Association. Others were economists who did not get any salary, but all were men of the highest reputation. Incidentally I might say that Mr. Page is a Democrat. The politics of the others I do not know. They were selected on account of their ability, without regard to politics. They presented this plan with reference to consolidated returns to the committee, and why did they present it instead of the present law? They said that we ought to have the returns made separately, because the present system was so complicated and made much trouble; that nothing came to the department about which they got into so many disputes as these consolidated returns. Of course, section 118 would impose a considerable burden on the corporations who were required to make all these separate returns, and that is the reason why I said when the matter was before the House that the corporations did not want this provision in the bill. They preferred the present law, instead of having to make returns for every separate corporation, which would make much more work. Well, as the bill originally read before section 118 was stricken out on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, they were opposed to it because it would make them a great deal more work.

But this advisory committee and the joint committee agreed with them on that matter and felt that the best method was to require separate returns. It was an effort in the direction of simplification. That is all, and yet the Secretary of the Treasury, who did not propose it, is accused of favoring a plan for his own advantage. It allows corporations to offset the losses of companies in which they owned 95 per cent or more of the stock. At first blush that might look like a one-sided proposition, to allow the losses and make no provision with reference to the gains, but no provision with reference to gains was necessary, because the gains would be taxed anyway, and they would be taxed at exactly the same rates, because we have a flat corporation rate that would apply to them singly or taken together and in any event. This is the situation. The Secretary of the Treasury never urged this. It is not his plan; he is not to be charged with it, whether it be good or bad. I think it is a good plan and ought to stay in the bill.

As to section 141, nobody wants it repealed. What some want is section 118 restored to the bill. Others want the provisions of the present law retained. I am not in favor of restoring the old provisions for consolidated returns which the gentleman from Texas voted for a number of times, but which I have concluded do not work well, and evidently the gentleman from Texas has come to the same conclusion.

Now, this whole matter is simply one of fairness to the corporations. I do not believe I can be accused with being any special friend of the corporations, and I hope that I am not charged with being an enemy to them, because I am not. I want to treat them fairly and squarely. But if an individual is carrying on a business in one town, and also carries on a business in another town, he can offset the losses which he may sustain from either one of those businesses which he owns. He owns both of them, and there is not any question about it. Why should not a corporation be permitted the same thing? Why should we not deal fairly and squarely with corporations, the same as we do with individuals?

I can see no reason why we should not. The gentleman from Texas says that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks the corporations will have to pay a great deal more taxes. Perhaps they would if section 141 did not stay in the bill and they did not have two years in which to adjust themselves to the situation. And yet, the gentleman says the Secretary wants to strike out that section because of corporations in which he is personally interested!

I do not know of a tax expert anywhere, and I do not believe there is one who will claim that at the end of two years the corporations can not so adjust themselves that they will not have to pay more taxes to any considerable extent than they do now. I know that that is the view of Mr. McCoy, and I have heard the gentleman from Texas approve Mr. McCoy as being a highly competent expert. He is the Treasury Actuary, as you know. He says that the result of this proposition, as it stands in the bill, will not be to bring the Treasury any more taxes whatever.

I want to say just one word with reference to another provision that the gentleman got in the bill, and that is the graduated tax on corporations.

Well, I do not know how it is with the gentleman from Texas, but I have viewed with considerable alarm the growth of chain stores in this country. I doubt whether they are a good thing for the people and for anybody. I know this, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas prevails with reference to the graduated tax on corporations, I can go to the Standard Oil Co., which has its filling stations all over this country, and I can go to any of these chain stores and show them how they can, by incorporating their particular business in each town, get their rates reduced, and thus beat the Government out of a lot of money. That is the proposition that the gentleman claims is of such interest to the people generally. There is no question about that. No one can deny it.

Now, I have endeavored, gentlemen, to put this matter before you in a plain way. I make no charges against anybody, except that I think the gentleman from Texas gets highly mistaken about these tax matters at times, and I have endeavored to point out as well as I could the very serious errors into which he falls.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am sure the gentleman has tried to make it plain, and has made it plain; but I do not believe that the gentleman from Texas differs with any of us about the consolidated returns. I think the gentleman from Texas differs as to the several methods mentioned in section 118, which provided three methods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. GIFFORD. Some of us Members recognize our responsibility for the vote cast. The gentleman speaks of affiliated corporations. Any two under section 118 could file affiliated returns. The speaker has not referred to that provision. I believe the membership of this side of the House care little about the fortunes of Mr. Mellon. If the principle of the consolidated return is right, we want the consolidated return.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me understand the gentleman. Is the gentleman opposed to the consolidated returns or not?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am in favor of consolidated returns. That is the trouble. When section 118 went out of the bill, the committee allowed section 141 to remain, providing for two years, and no attempt was made by the committee to amend and extend the privilege which has been allowed since 1918.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then the gentleman does not oppose that?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; I have not opposed it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself disagree on any fundamental matter. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and I differ absolutely. The gentleman from Massachusetts agrees that we ought to have consolidated returns in some form. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Texas we would not have them at all after the year 1928.

Mr. GIFFORD. I understood the gentleman from Texas made the statement this morning, or before, that he believed in one method or the other. He sees danger in both consolidated and separate returns.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no question about what the gentleman from Texas wants, and the argument against the principle of the consolidated returns was the feature of his argument on the bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman from Texas got the bill in that shape, and all of us who voted against section 118 left it in that shape; but I can not understand the attitude of the committee in not trying to correct sections 141 and 240 after section 118 was stricken out.

Mr. TREADWAY. My colleague means the committee as a whole.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] argued that the consolidated-return provision enabled the big corporations to take advantage of the little ones, so that the House struck out 118 and left in no provision by which such returns could be made. The committee could only assume that the majority agreed with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I think it might be well to remind the House and the country that we have reached the open season in the political jungle of 1928. I think the address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] yesterday was entirely political. His purpose was, if possible, to charge the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasury Department, and the administration with postponement in the passage of the tax reduction bill or the tax revision bill upon selfish grounds, namely, that the Secretary of the Treasury and others associated with the administration are so interested in corporation taxes that because they disapprove of the elimination of consolidated returns for corporations they would prevent entirely the passage of any tax reduction bill this year.

Now, the gentleman from Texas is in the habit of charging certain things on the floor of the House, and then challenging somebody to deny it, and if no denial is made, if his challenge is not accepted, then he assumes that his charge must be taken as true and correct. So on the floor yesterday he made the charge that the Secretary of the Treasury is holding up the tax reduction bill because he does not like the elimination of the original section 118 in the committee bill or the limitation contained in section 141.

Now, what grounds has the gentleman from Texas for that viewpoint? Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Undersecretary of the Treasury, and the President himself, ever since last fall, have insisted that the tax reduction could not go beyond $225,000,000 with safety to the United States and future financial operations? And when the House did go beyond $225,000,000 to the extent of $67,000,000, of course, to be consistent—and they were consistent—they insisted that that reduction was too large. But the gentleman from Texas would try to make the country believe that it was because there were some other things in the bill which they did not like. For that view he submitted no proof or facts, but his own surmises and deductions. The fact is that the administration has become naturally apprehensive as to the final amount of tax reduction that may be contained in the revenue bill now pending in the Senate, and therefore believes it wise not to press the legislation until the tax income for 1927 may be quite accurately ascertained. The gentleman from Texas, however, is trying to make political capital out of this wise delay.

I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was in the confidence of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Undersecretary of the Treasury to the extent that they have told him that because they would suffer by reason of these provisions in the bill on the subject of consolidated returns they would oppose the passage of this bill. Does anybody believe, as a matter of fact, that the Secretary of the Treasury would do any such thing? Would the Secretary of the Treasury take the gentleman from Texas into his confidence or anybody else and say to him, "I am stopping this bill and I am going to prevent the passage of this bill because some of the corporations in which I am heavily interested are going to be compelled to pay larger taxes." Oh, no; the gentleman from Texas did not mean to imply anything of the sort. He knows he has no such information in spite of his very great assurance when he appears here and says, "I charge so-and-so and I challenge anybody to deny it." He points at gentlemen in the House and says, "I challenge the gentleman from Iowa, I challenge the gentleman from Illinois, and I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania," and if you do not get upon your feet immediately and tell the gentleman from Texas that he is telling an untruth or that he is mistaken in what he says, his statement must be taken as absolutely true and the country must believe it.

Oh, pshaw; we have gotten into the quadrennial season of political debate and the gentleman from Texas thought he would start the political battle of 1928 by an attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury. But let us not be so serious about it. It has not hurt the Secretary of the Treasury; it has not hurt the President of the United States; it has not hurt the administration or the Republican Party. When the returns come in even during this year, the confidence of the people in the party, in the administration, in the Secretary of the Treasury, and in the President of the United States will be amply demonstrated. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

TARIFF REVISION

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be agreed that whatever the effect of the expressions of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] upon the feelings of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Undersecretary of the Treasury may have been, he at least did succeed in flushing the covey in the House of Representatives. [Laughter and applause.]

I did not, however, arise, Mr. Chairman, to inject myself into a discussion of that particular phase of taxation, but an occurrence took place earlier in the day here in the House so remarkable in its character, both as to its parliamentary and its possible political and economic aspects, that I think it highly proper that a plain statement should be made of just what was involved.

On yesterday the Senate of the United States did about the only thing the Senate could do under the circumstances in regard to a tariff revision. All know, and the Senate itself no longer than yesterday was reminded by the House of the fact, that revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives; and the Senate, recognizing this fact and feeling that the time had come in the economic condition of the country when there should be a revision of certain of the tariff rates, took the only course that was open to it and passed the resolution I hold in my hand, which reads:

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such excessive rates, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all.

Resolved further, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

It was duly transmitted and presented to the House immediately after the reading of the Journal—a respectful and meaning gesture on the part of a body which could not originate the legislation it suggested because of constitutional limitations. After it had been read to the House the question arose as to what would be the reaction of the House to the suggestion of the Senate, and we began to try to find some method of expression. I myself made a motion. The final motion made by me was that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, the committee charged under the rules of the House, made in accordance with the Constitution, with the responsibility of formulating tariff legislation. The Speaker, first upon his own motion and later upon a point of order made by the floor leader of the majority [Mr. TILSON], held that such a motion was not in order. What a remarkable ruling that was. I realize the Speaker had to make that ruling without a chance to examine the precedents and without any particular opportunity of reasoning out this proposition. I express the opinion here and now that it is very doubtful whether the Speaker, who I know wishes always to be parliamentarily correct, will adhere to that opinion after he has had an opportunity of reasoning it out.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that unquestionably a resolution of this character coming to the House, being read to the House, and being physically here, the House had the right to refer it to some committee of the House for action.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind an interruption right there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to remind the gentleman that at first the Speaker refused to have it read to the House, when the gentleman from Tennessee asked that it be submitted, and it was only after the question of the point of order came up that the Speaker had it read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Speaker, I believe, in response to my suggestion that it be read, stated that it had been read by a clerk of the Senate, but, of course, that is not the way the matter should come before the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLANTON. A matter can come before the House only when it is read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Unquestionably, so far as the matter of procedure is concerned, I think the gentleman from Texas is correct. Now, I do not insist it would have been the duty of the Speaker of his own motion to have made a reference of this resolution. I am not prepared to speak upon that point at this time. I do not know what his duty would probably have been, and I shall not insist it was his duty to refer it. We sought to save the Speaker any responsibility in that connection by letting the House itself take action. I made a respectful appeal from the decision of the Chair; the gentleman from Connecticut moved to lay that appeal upon the table, and the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut prevailed.

Now, let us see precisely what it meant. It meant—it could have meant nothing less—that gentlemen voting for the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut did not concur in the thought that there should be a revision of any of the tariff schedules at this time. It is true that that direct question was not before the House, but gentlemen of long experience in this House, many of whom have raised their voices in the country, if they have been correctly reported by the press of the country, in favor of a revision of the tariff, who have threatened the stand-pat element of their own party with party revolution if they did not respond in an effort, not to bring about a Democratic tariff but in an effort simply to so adjust rates—proceeding, if they desired, upon the protective principle—as that there should be a greater equality between industry and agriculture. Those gentlemen are chargeable with a knowledge of the rules of the House; they do know the rules and they are bound to know that this presented their first opportunity even to make a gesture toward bringing about that which they so earnestly proclaim they desire. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Would this resolution have allowed a raising of the tariff rates on agricultural products? Did it not speak only of a reduction?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say to the gentleman, the committee of course, when it had taken jurisdiction of the subject matter, would have brought in such bill as it saw proper to bring in. Of course, it would have lain within the power of the committee to have brought in a bill which would have been violative of this resolution.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; and it would have to be violative of the resolution if it raised any of the tariffs on agricultural products.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, that, of course, would be a question to be discussed at another day and at another time. The thing I am seeking to emphasize now is that gentlemen have cut themselves off——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The resolution of the Senate was directed to the House of Representatives. Does not the gentleman think that the proper, final depository for that resolution is in the archives of the House rather than in the archives of a committee, and is not the Committee on Ways and Means as well informed of the contents of that resolution, whether the resolution goes to them or not?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I think it would help them to read it over again. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Fortunately, it will appear twice in the RECORD. The gentleman has put it in the RECORD again, and it will appear in the RECORD at the point where it was presented this morning. So the members of the Ways and Means Committee will have no trouble in reading the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] quibbles. Action on the part of this House in referring this resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means would have indicated to that committee that action from that committee was desired. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me say to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] that the resolution from the Senate declared that it was "to establish a closer parity between agriculture and industry" and thus it was to bring about an adjustment of rates that would be fairer to agriculture.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, the gentleman had better read the resolution again.

Mr. LEAVITT. It states by "a reduction of tariffs," and if we followed the spirit of it, would not allow any raising whatever of any tariffs on agricultural products, and that is the reason that many of us were opposed to it.

Mr. BLANTON. But its purpose was to bring about an adjustment of rates in behalf of agriculture. I read the resolution carefully.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, let me say one word more on the parliamentary situation, because I am not so sure this thing is all over yet. If a petition from a single individual or a group of individuals, however small, should come to this body and any Member of the House were willing to assume the responsibility of presenting it by dropping it in the basket or presenting it from the floor, if he should have an opportunity to present it from the floor, that resolution would be taken and, under the rules of the House, referred to a committee. Here is a resolution of the Senate of the United States dealing with a profoundly serious subject, suggesting a revision of the tariff laws that affect industry and agriculture and every interest and activity of the citizens of the country. It comes to the House in a regular and official way, and the House precludes itself from even having its committee consider it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will tell my colleague why I voted not to sustain the Chair. I saw a statement where a certain gentleman from Iowa had prepared a bill to place a duty on hides, which duty has not been placed upon them by the party in power, and every cattleman in my district—and I take it in the gentleman's district—wants a duty on hides; and how are we going to get it unless this matter is referred to the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the only way to get it, and I am with my colleague on that proposition.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is why I voted not to sustain the Chair.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question on the parliamentary situation?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COLTON. Does the gentleman contend that every resolution which is a Senate resolution purely that is passed by the Senate should be acted upon by the House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I contend that if the House desires to act upon it and to send it to a committee, it has the right so to do, and that therefore the Speaker was in error in making his ruling and that a majority of the House was in error in sustaining the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. COLTON. If, for instance, the Senate should notify us of its appointment of a Secretary, for example, does the gentleman feel that the parliamentary situation is such that there should be action on the part of the House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I do not think there should be, but, of course, the House might refer even that resolution to a committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee five more minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the House chose to refer that to a committee, I think it would have a perfect right, as a parliamentary proposition, to do so. Of course, I do not think there would ever be any necessity for that. But this is a resolution dealing with a matter of legislation, of legislation which must originate in the House, respectfully suggested by another body which is ready to act, but which can not act because of a constitutional limitation, and a majority of the House refuses to place it even at a point where there can be a beginning upon the subject matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin and Mr. MANSFIELD rose.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman wants to defend himself probably.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Here is a question that occurs to me which might be relevant. The ordinary resolution in Congress is either joint or concurrent. A Senate joint resolution requires the action of both the Senate and of the House and the signature of the President and then becomes law.

A Senate concurrent resolution, in order to have any effect, requires the action of both the Senate and the House, but does not require the signature of the President. It does, however, bind the two bodies. Then there is a third kind of resolution, which is neither joint nor concurrent, but is a purely House resolution or a purely Senate resolution.

When a concurrent resolution comes here from the Senate and is reported by the Clerk, he always says, "In which the concurrence of the House is requested." No such request was made on this resolution because it is purely a Senate resolution, a mere expression of Senate opinion. Now, if a Senate concurrent resolution or a Senate joint resolution were referred to a House committee, the committee could bring in the resolution with an amendment or amendments; but had this mere Senate resolution been referred to a House committee, how would such a committee bring back the resolution? It could neither deny nor amend the Senate's expression of its own opinion. What could the committee have reported under that resolution of the Senate?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It could have reported a bill [applause] and given the House an opportunity to act upon it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It can do that at any time without the slightest reference to this resolution. But the committee could not report this Senate resolution to the House, either with or without amendment, for legislative action. That is the difference between the two situations.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, let us get right down then to the very serious proposition, if my friend from Wisconsin does not object, would he like to see a bill reported? If my friend from Wisconsin does not object to answering the question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a very artful way to get away from what I was talking about. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Ah, Mr. Chairman, we need not quibble——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says I rose to defend myself. I did not at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, I withdraw the statement.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I rose to discuss the question and the gentleman evaded it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean to evade it. I understood the gentleman made a statement, as a fact, which might have an important bearing upon the parliamentary matter, but did not understand he was asking me a question.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman from Tennessee did ask a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman from Wisconsin did not answer.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not in the habit of dodging, and he especially is not apt to dodge anything which comes from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. The gentleman from Wisconsin has not evaded anything. It occurred to him as certainly a proper question on parliamentary procedure whether a Senate resolution which is neither joint nor concurrent, but merely expressive of Senate opinion, requires or is properly subject to action of any kind by the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will answer in this way: Under the gentleman's own reasoning he would have been at liberty to vote as he pleased under the reference of the resolution, but we never reached that point. The gentleman from Wisconsin and others who voted as he did precluded the House from voting as to whether they wanted it so referred or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. CULLEN. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, we need not deceive ourselves. One of the very serious questions that confronts the Congress and the country is that of undertaking to formulate some character of legislation that will aid distressed agriculture. We differ as to methods, but I take it there is no one here—and he does not have to be a Democrat to speak of it—that does not recognize the distress of agriculture.

One of the strongest clubs which agriculture has to wield is the favoritism that has been shown other interests in this country and which we know have been shown other interests; in my opinion more marked in favoritism that has been written in the tariff laws than in any other legislation which Congress has passed.

The use of that argument causes every man giving thought to farm legislation and who stands under the pressure, political and otherwise, for agricultural legislation, causes every man to have to take a tight grip on his intellectual integrity lest he be led into the support of something which a number of farmers believe would help them, but which he does not believe would help them.

I believe you will find in every substantial farmers' organization in America which has given consideration to farm relief legislation seriously and without reference to its political aspects—those organizations who have not permitted themselves to come under the domination of partisan politics—I believe you will find in the expressions given out by everyone of them—one of the very first elements in it is the demand for the reduction of the tariff duties upon things the farmer has to buy. [Applause.]

This resolution of the Senate recognizes that condition and deals with it in express terms. This House, the majority party, under the leadership of the majority leader, cut itself off from even making a gesture toward bringing relief in the way of tariff revision, which is at least one aspect of the relief demanded by the agricultural interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. I will ask the gentleman if he considers the resolution exactly fair in view of the universal sentiment throughout the West and of the demand from farm organizations of the country for the increase of rates on farm products, in view of the existing imports amounting to at least a billion and a half dollars of competitive farm products in this country?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Personally I am satisfied with the resolution, but the gentleman must not lose sight of the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means does not have to go exactly by the resolution. It could make up a bill to suit itself, but the gentleman has voted against even that, has voted against even saying we want them to make up anything. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I come from an agricultural State and district. I am in favor of revising the tariff on agricultural products upwards. [Applause.] I want to increase the tariff on canned meats, on beef, corn, dairy products, hides, and I do not want any revision downwards. [Applause.]

I do not want any resolution to go through here and go to the Ways and Means Committee that says we want a revision downward. I believe in a protective tariff. I do not believe you can have the high standard of living that we have in this country, so much higher than the other nations of the earth, unless you have a tariff wall to keep out cheap foreign agricultural and manufactured products made with cheap labor. I want to protect American labor and the American farmer, and I want to do it by a tariff. I do not want to leave tariff laws to the Democratic Party. The inference to be drawn from the speeches we have heard to-day is that if they could get hold of the tariff, oh, my, how they would help the farmers of the country! They would like to go to the country now and say: "We, the Democratic Party, want to help the farmer." I hold in my hand the record of the Democratic Party on what they did to my farmers when they were in power.

Mr. RAYBURN. When did the farmer get the highest price for his products—under a Democratic or a Republican administration?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. During the war and at that time you set price on wheat and did not do so on cotton.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the Republican candidate for President had more to do with it than anybody else.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; he did not.

Mr. RAYBURN. Your next candidate for President had more to do with it than anybody else.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Oh, the next candidate for President is coming from Kansas—Hon. CHARLES CURTIS. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Oh, he will never get a smell.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. And the farmers will never get a smell, if the Democrats win on the tariff proposition. Here is what you did in 1913, here is your record for agriculture, and here is also the record of the Republican Party:

Under the Republican tariff of 1922 the duty on wheat was first fixed at 30 cents a bushel and later we raised it to 42 cents a bushel, and under the Democratic tariff of 1913 it was made tariff free. Corn in the Republican tariff was given 15 cents a bushel protection, and under the Democratic tariff law it was free. Rye under the Republican tariff law was protected by 15 cents a bushel, while under the Democratic tariff it was free. Oats under the Republican law were granted 15 cents a bushel, and under the Democratic law 6 cents. Butter under the Republican law was 8 cents and later was increased to 12 cents a pound, while under the Democratic law it stood at 2½ cents a pound. Eggs under the Republican law were protected by a tariff of 8 cents a dozen, and under the Democratic law they were free. Dressed poultry under the Republican tariff was 3 cents a pound, and under the Democratic law 1 cent a pound. Milk under the Republican tariff was 2½ cents a pound, while under the Democratic tariff it was free. Cream under the Republican tariff was taxed at 20 cents a gallon, while under the Democratic law it was free. Honey, 3 cents a pound under the Republican tariff, and 10 cents a gallon under the Democratic tariff. Alfalfa, 4 cents under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Clovers, millets, timothy, all protected under the Republican tariff and all free under the Democratic law. Fresh beef and veal, 3 cents a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic tariff. Cattle of a thousand and fifty pounds and under, a cent and a half under the Republican law and free under the Democratic. Cattle of a thousand and fifty pounds and over, 2 cents a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Meat, prepared or preserved, 20 per cent ad valorem under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Fresh lamb, 4 cents a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Fresh mutton, 2½ cents a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic tariff. Sheep, $2 a head under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Swine, half a cent a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Bacon, 2 cents a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic tariff. Lard, 1 cent a pound under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. In a moment. Lard compounds, 4 cents under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law. Hay, $4 a ton under the Republican tariff and free under the Democratic law.

That is the record of the two parties so far as a protection of agricultural products is concerned. [Applause on the Republican side.] I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman, like myself, represents a livestock district as well as a farming district. The gentleman's party has been in power now for about seven years. Will the gentleman tell me how much they have given to the cowman as a duty on hides?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They have not given him a duty on hides, and I have stood with the gentleman from Texas for such a duty; but they did give him a tariff of $20 on his steers, and the Democrats did not give him any protection at all. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman realizes that if we did put a tariff on hides we would not raise the price of a pair of shoes 10 cents. The gentleman further realizes that the tariff on hides would probably put into the pockets of the cattleman at least $5 a head on every cow that he owns, and he needs it. Most of them have gone into bankruptcy. Some of them now are getting their feet on safe ground. When we are not putting an additional tax on the consumer who buys a pair of shoes by granting the cattleman a small ad valorem duty on hides, will the gentleman tell me how we can relieve the cattleman, when he voted against referring this resolution? I do not understand that it was revising the tariff downward on agricultural products, but it was a question of referring it to a committee that has the right to report out a bill. Will the gentleman tell me how he can relieve the cattleman under those circumstances?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. You are trying to make the country believe that if we had sent this resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means it would have forced out a resolution for tariff revision. It would not have resulted in any such thing. They would not have had to do anything with it that they did not want to do. The question was whether we would override a Republican Speaker and override a resolution of the Republican leader and stay within our organization or not. I am a Republican, and I will stay with my organization when I think it is right, and I think it is right in this case. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Whatever the Senate resolution is and does, the gentleman and his party voted to throw it in the wastebasket.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No.

Mr. BLANTON. What did you do?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We keep it in the House.

Mr. BLANTON. It is in the wastebasket now. The people of the country will pass on what the resolution is and does and what the gentleman and his party have done with it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. This resolution, containing the provision that the reduction be made downward, would necessarily mean a reduction on agricultural products downward, would it not?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes. I will answer that. My friend from Texas here [Mr. HUDSPETH] and I agree concerning the tariff on hides. But to override our leader and our Committee on Ways and Means on this resolution to revise tariff rates downward would not give you any assurance that we were to get a duty on hides.

You are trying to get credit from the farmers for doing something that you have not done. When you were in power and had the chance, why did you not put a tariff on hides?

You not only did not put a tariff on hides, but you did not put a duty on cattle or any other agricultural products. We have given you a duty of $20 on cattle, and now you are blaming us for not also putting a duty on hides, when you know to have done so would have forced a duty on shoes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The reason I did not vote that way was that I was not a Member of Congress at that time. [Laughter.] If I had been here I would have voted to put a duty on hides so that they could not ship in those foreign hides here. With those foreign hides coming here a duty on hides in this country would not affect the price of shoes to the extent of 10 cents a pair.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I agree with you, but I am not going to vote for a resolution coming in here, supported by the Democratic Party, to revise the tariff downward. What I want to do is to get a tariff revision upward on agricultural products! [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will say to the gentleman as to that, that much as I regret to do so, I sometimes vote with the Republicans when I think they are right.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. And I will vote with you for a tariff on hides.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think you are right. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not an important matter as to where this resolution physically is at the present time; whether it is before the Committee on Ways and Means or is buried here in its grave; and that is what happened to-day. But that is entirely immaterial. The question, the appealing question, before the country to-day is this: Which party in the Congress of the United States is in favor of a logical downward revision of the tariff and which party is against it?

That is the question. Our tariff law is out of date. It is archaic. It was out of date 10 minutes after it was passed. It does not fit into modern conditions in this world. We have embarked on a new economic era. We are selling money abroad now; we have so much of it, concentrated in the hands of a few, that we are selling it abroad, and we are getting back under this plutocratic administration more money every year for the money we sell abroad than we are getting for the goods we sell abroad. Our balance of trade is two or three or four hundred million dollars less per year than the amount we get as interest from the funds we have loaned abroad.

Now, every economist in the world of any standing at all knows that those conditions exist, and if the present tariff is to remain, that pushes us nearer and ever nearer to the precipice. Everybody seems to know that except certain leaders of the Republican Party. Everybody seems to know that except the Republican side of this House. It is behind the economists of the world. It is behind the conditions which confront us now; and the point about the whole thing is that, with the exception of 8 or 10 who sit on that side of the Chamber, to-day you have unanimously voted against a proposition which looked toward giving to this country a logical and a lower tariff, or take a step in the direction of giving to this country a tariff which fits into the modern scheme of business on which we have entered in this world.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] correctly analyzed the Underwood bill. It did not place any tariff on the things he has mentioned. It did not put a duty on them, because the kind of tariffs you impose on agricultural products are not effective.

We knew it was not effective, and it did not go on. You had it in the laws which preceded the Underwood tariff, and you have put it in the present law; but the fact remains that under the Underwood tariff bill we got higher prices for the things we produce on our farms than we ever succeeded in getting before or since.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. If the Democrats were writing the next tariff bill, would they take the tariff off of agricultural products again?

Mr. RAINEY. If the Democrats were writing the next tariff law, they would give agricultural products effective rates. That is what they would do.

Mr. LEAVITT. What would that do? Would that put them on or take them off the tariff list?

Mr. RAINEY. An effective tariff on agricultural products would give the agricultural products a real tariff. It would restore the purchasing power of the farmer, and that is the proposition for which the farmers of this country stand.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not understand, and I am probably dense on that, but the gentleman has not yet said whether that would be a lower tariff, and whether the gentleman would take the rates off or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Under the leadership of the Democratic Party, in some instances it might mean lower and in other instances it might mean higher, but in every instance it would mean a logical tariff; and that is what we can not expect from your party.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. I am interested in products raised in Montana, like sugar, wheat, wool, cattle, and things of that kind. What would the gentleman do with those things under his logical tariff?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say this about wool and I will say this about sugar for the benefit of the gentleman from Montana: Those are two articles that this country must have. The higher you place the tariff on those two articles the bigger the price the consumer will pay for those two articles. We live in the north temperate zone, and we have got to wear woolen clothing. We produce only one-half of our supply of wool, and if you put a tariff on that wool we will try to keep warm, if we can, but we will have to pay a higher price, and we will have to meet the rigors of our cold winters. Would the gentleman increase the tariff on wool?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes. I would certainly not lower it.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman for his frankness. He would increase the tariff on wool until the people who must wear woolen clothing in this country or die must pay the price fixed by the greed of those who raise wool in Montana, where sheep roam over land that is not adapted to any other purpose.

Mr. LEAVITT. And should therefore be used for the raising of wool.

Mr. RAINEY. That would result in raising the price of clothing to every working man who works in a factory; it would raise the price of clothing to every farmer who toils on his farm. That is the effect of that policy and I would be against it, I will say to the gentleman. A high tariff does not help the wool industry, because the number of sheep on our ranges is constantly decreasing.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is not true of Montana.

Mr. RAINEY. That is true through the country generally, I will say to the gentleman, that you have fewer sheep now than you ever had before.

Mr. LEAVITT. Then we need more of a tariff to protect the sheep industry and not less.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has been perfectly frank and he emphasizes the protectionist idea of the tariff. No matter how many people in this country suffer he is perfectly willing to let them suffer provided the men who live in Montana can make more money out of it. In other words, his position is this: As to all of these other things he must buy, he is perfectly willing to be robbed himself in order to enjoy the delightful privilege of robbing everybody else. The gentleman is an ideal protectionist and an ideal Republican.

Mr. LEAVITT. I thank the gentleman for that compliment. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. My desire is not to rob anybody, but to protect an American industry so that we can use our own lands to the best advantage.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has made his selfish position so plain that it is unnecessary for me to comment upon it further. He is willing that everybody must pay twice as much as he pays now for clothing to shut out the blasts of winter in order that a few sheep barons in the wilds of his own State can make some more money. There is no trouble about the Republican position. That is it, and the gentleman has made it perfectly plain.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will call attention to the fact that under the Underwood tariff law copra had a tariff on it of 1 cent per pound. Under the present tariff law it is on the free list. Copra is the substance from which coconut oil is made, and millions of tons of coconut oil are now competing with hog lard in this country.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman from Texas is absolutely right. The Underwood law was logical in all particulars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. Apropos of the suggestion of the gentleman from Montana with respect to the effectiveness of the present tariff on agricultural products, may I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that according to the Chicago Tribune, a great Republican newspaper, on last Saturday, cash wheat in Winnipeg sold at $1.37¾ a bushel and $1.23⅞ in Minneapolis, a difference of 14 cents in favor of the Winnipeg market. Also on the same day, the Chicago price of May wheat was $1.30, Minneapolis $1.27, and Winnipeg $1.36. On the same day the price in Chicago of July wheat was $1.26, Minneapolis $1.28, and Winnipeg $1.35. Further, during one-half of the period from the time of the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, the price of wheat in Winnipeg has been from 4 to 14 cents a bushel above the price of the same grade of wheat in Minneapolis and in Chicago, which shows the wheat often commands a higher price in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. That is true, of course, and that has always been true.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I regret I can not yield again. Perhaps if I have time later I will yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman directed a question to me.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, go ahead. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that difference is because there is a tariff on wheat.

Mr. RAINEY. I will answer that. The difference is because it is better wheat there. That is the difference.

Mr. LEAVITT. If the gentleman will yield further, I will state that Montana went into the Chicago grain show this fall and took the sweepstakes over the rest of the world on its wheat, so there is no better wheat anywhere.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, you might have had a bushel or two that would do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEAVITT. We raised 76,000,000 bushels of wheat that will compete with the wheat of any country in the world and will take the prizes at any grain show.

Mr. RAINEY. I congratulate the gentleman in Montana, whoever he was, who had enough time to pick out enough good grains of wheat to beat this wheat they sell up there in Winnipeg.

Mr. LEAVITT. The show was in the gentleman's own State and the gentleman's State took no prizes at that show.

Mr. RAINEY. We do not raise hard wheat to any extent and we do not pretend to be a wheat State. If we did and if we tried, we would not stop for Montana, but would go right ahead and be the greatest wheat State in the Union.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] further complicates the matter for me to understand. If Montana raises better wheat, why does it take a less price under protection in competition with a poorer grade of wheat in Canada where the tariff is not so high?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, the more the gentleman from Montana says, the more illogical his position becomes [laughter], and this is true of anybody who tries to defend a protective tariff in this world at the present time. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman and I were together on the McNary-Haugen bill, were we not? And that was intended to make the wheat tariff effective.

Mr. RAINEY. If we were, I congratulate the gentleman. For once the gentleman was right.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman from Montana was also right on that point when the gentleman from Illinois was wrong in a previous Congress, because the gentleman was then opposed to the first bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Not at all. I opposed the first McNary-Haugen bill because it was utterly illogical and would not have worked, and the farm organizations themselves now admit it. Let me say to the gentleman, however, that illogical as the first McNary-Haugen bill was, all that it attempted to do was to restore the purchasing power to the produce which the farmer raised on his farm which that produce enjoyed in a Democratic year, 1913. If the gentleman is wedded to the first McNary-Haugen bill, that is all he tried to do—to get for the farmers a Democratic price for what they produced. The second McNary-Haugen bill contained an effort to make what tariff you give to the farmer effective, and this was not in the first bill; and the position taken by the gentleman now, if he supported the second McNary-Haugen bill, and the position taken by him then are absolutely irreconcilable.

Of course, we did not get during the Wilson administration the highest prices for farm products we ever got in the history of the country, because they were on the free list. We got the highest prices for farm products the country ever knew because our present system of tariffs has nothing to do with fixing those prices, except in a few instances, no matter how high you make it.

The prices of farm products were brought about by the prosperity which prevailed during the Wilson administration [applause], and which has failed since then.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. A prosperity which we do not have to-day except in certain spots in this country. They call attention to the per capita wealth which the country enjoys at the present time; that is, they take the entire wealth of the United States and divide it by the number of people who live here, and call that the per capita wealth of the country. This Republican per capita method of doing things does not appeal to me. In order to illustrate what I mean—take Andrew W. Mellon, Henry Ford, and myself, just we three. Together we are worth $4,000,000,000. In order to tell how much we are worth per capita you divide that by three; and if you divide that by three you reach the conclusion at once that I am worth over $1,000,000,000, and I want to deny it so far as I am concerned. They have still got the $4,000,000,000 when you make that kind of a division, and I have still got the per capita, and that is all I get out of it. [Laughter.]

So we have to-day a prosperity which exists in spots, with money in the hands of a few people, an aristocracy of money; so much money that they are hunting for new and ever new fields of investment abroad at high rates of interest; so much money that they have got to send it away from the United States in order to invest it and to bring back the returns they are demanding. At the present time throughout the New England States, the very center of the protection field of this country, every day, more and more spindles become silent; every day more and more men are out of employment; and it will not be long until you commence to hear from that sort of thing. This country can not exist with its wealth, with its income monopolized under the present fiscal policies of this administration in the hands of a few; and so this afternoon almost the solid vote on the Democratic side of the House stood in favor of a logical downward revision of the tariff, the kind of a revision which would increase the purchasing power of the farmers' dollar; the kind of a revision which would increase the purchasing power of every man who toils, whether in field or factory or mine; the kind of purchasing power that the people of this country are demanding. We stood for that on this side, and with the exception of 8 or 10 courageous Republicans you registered this afternoon your opposition to that sort of a régime.

You registered your approval of the present conditions which create millionaires in ever-increasing numbers, until to-day under your régime we have twice as many as when you commenced operations in 1921 and four times as many as we had when the war started in Europe. Why? Under your manipulation of the fiscal affairs of this country, headed by a multimillionaire of multimillionaires—because Mr. Mellon is the real head of this administration—you have consolidated the wealth of the country until just a comparatively few people have it. You now have, and can point with pride to the fact, I presume, that there are 208 men of the United States whose income is $1,000,000 a year; and more than that, quite a considerable number of them have incomes larger than $1,000,000 a year. This is a Republican creation to which you can point with pride. We can not point with pride to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. We would prefer that that money by a sound fiscal system, a system of lower taxes and a proper adjustment of taxes, be distributed throughout the length and breadth of this land, to bring happiness and comfort and higher standards of living and better standards of living into the homes of the poorer people.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] several years ago made a different kind of speech and then placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a table of 17 different farm implements, showing how much more they cost the farmers down in Kansas under the Fordney-McCumber Act than they did under the Underwood Tariff Act. I have that RECORD here, and I wonder if the gentleman would like to put that table of Mr. STRONG'S in his speech to offset the other table that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] read?

Mr. RAINEY. If the gentleman from Kansas has anything of value, I would be glad to put it in, but so far he has not presented anything of value.

Mr. BLANTON. It shows 17 different farm implements upon which, he said, the farmers of Kansas had to pay so much more under the Fordney-McCumber Act than they did under the Underwood Act. I have the table here, and I wish the gentleman would read it.

Mr. RAINEY. It may be interesting. Have I lots of time?

Mr. BLANTON. Go ahead and read it.

Mr. RAINEY. Whenever you want me to quit, let me know.

Mr. CULLEN. I would be glad to yield the gentleman further time, but there are quite a number of requests for time on this side.

Mr. RAINEY. I am not going to take the time to read it now.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. RAINEY. I will read it.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the gentleman from Kansas's own table, applicable to the State of Kansas.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I admit it.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope the gentleman from Kansas will take time to explain it to the farmers in his State.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am going to explain it in about a minute.

Mr. RAINEY. After the gentleman has explained it, I hope he will call attention to the fact that under a Democratic administration the farmer paid the prices I named first for implements which he used in producing his foodstuffs, and under a Republican administration he paid the prices that I read second. And then let the farmers decide which they like the better.

I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he might continue his explanation as to what happened to the farmers by calling attention to the prices they got for pigs and cattle and cereals of all kinds when they were produced under low Democratic prices for farm implements with which they made their crops and then the comparatively small prices they get at the present time. The gentleman can explain also how the farmers have left the farms in the State of Kansas and how many more have left during the past year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I put that table in the RECORD of what the farmers were paying for agricultural implements at the time we were trying to pass farm-relief legislation.

The farmers of this country know that the Democratic Party is not their friend. This talk of trying to make the farmers believe that they were prosperous under the Democratic administration and went to the bad under the Republican Administration is all camouflage.

Here is what happened: When you took possession of the Government in 1912 we were paying low prices for agricultural implements; we were getting fair prices for products of the farm. What did you do? In 1913 you passed a tariff law and put practically every agricultural product on the free list, so low that agricultural products came into this country from all over the world. Eggs came from China by the shipload; butter from Norway, Denmark, and Sweden; milk, cheese, and wheat from Canada; wool and sheep from Australia; corn, cattle, and meat products from Argentina. All tariff free.

During the war, of course, prices went up, but we would have got much better prices if the Democratic Party had not declared that wheat could only go to $2.26 in Chicago.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. How long had we been in the war in 1914 when the gentleman called attention that machinery was selling for one-third of the price for what it is now selling?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. You had just got in.

Mr. AYRES. We did not get into the war until 1917.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I mean you had just got into power, when you passed your tariff act. We were paying low prices——

Mr. AYRES. Oh, the gentleman ought to be fair. The Underwood tariff bill was in operation only until the Fordney-McCumber bill was passed.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It went into operation months before war broke out in Europe, and low prices on agricultural machinery and fair prices on agricultural products had been in existence for years, and my friend from Kansas knows it. You passed a tariff bill putting agricultural products on the free list and agricultural products came in from all over the world and down went prices of agricultural products. Wheat went down to 65 cents in Marshall County, Kans., in the spring of 1914.

Mr. AYRES. That must be the only county in the State.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No, it was all over Kansas.

Mr. AYRES. It was $1.10 in October, 1914.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes, after war started in Europe. But in 1913 you passed your tariff law, and put agricultural products on the free list, and agricultural products fell in price. We could not meet the cheap foreign prices. Then came on the war in Europe, in 1914, and then is when prices began to go up. You can not dodge by saying that we did not get in the war until 1917. We had the benefit of war prices the fall of 1914 and in 1915 and 1916, before we got into the war, and everybody knows that.

Mr. AYRES. I would like to hear the gentleman's explanation of the table that he put in the RECORD in 1924.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Then sit down and give me a chance to tell you.

Mr. AYRES. I will be glad to do so if the gentleman will give us that explanation.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Oh, you gentlemen do not want information; you are trying to camouflage, and you do not want the facts. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AYRES rose.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Sit down a moment. I must refuse to yield. I want to tell you why that table was put in. I put that table in the RECORD when we were trying to pass farm relief legislation. I wanted agricultural products to have a better price. During and after the war you had held down the price on agricultural products—by your tariff bill which admitted foreign agricultural products free, and by your limitation on the price of wheat—and I wanted to show that everything the farmer had to buy had gone up; that he needed farm relief.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman please explain why the difference in the price of machinery in 1914 and in 1924. That is what I want to know.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I can explain it to you. We had war prices——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We had war prices. The price of materials went up everywhere, and we had to pay more for labor in making agricultural implements and the farmer had to pay high prices for them, while he did not get a like high price for what he had to sell, largely because the Democratic administration had permitted foreign agricultural products to come in tariff free and flood our markets, while they limited prices on the farmer's wheat and other products. We Republicans had passed the farmers' emergency tariff act and in 1924 were trying to get additional farm relief legislation, and I introduced the comparative table of prices of agricultural implements before and after the war to show the need of agriculture for farm relief legislation. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Not now. I note the Democrats do not like to have the truth told them.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is it not true that all of these agricultural implements are on the free list under the Republican tariff?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I shall come to that in a moment. When we came into power we found this condition. We found that everything that the farmer had to buy had gone up, while everything that he had to sell had gone down. Of course, during the war he got fair prices, but I am talking about conditions after the war. I have just a few moments ago told you what the Republican Party did when it passed its tariff law for the relief of agriculture when we came into power after the war. Here is what the Republican Party put on the free list in 1922 to reduce the high prices on what the farmers have to buy. We put on the free list "agricultural implements including picks, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers (except lawn mowers), horse rakes, cultivators, threshing machines, cotton gins, wagons and carts; livestock imported for breeding purposes, antitoxins, vaccines, serums, and bacterines; binding twine, barbed wire, either plain or galvanized, fertilizers, oil cake and oil-cake meal; building material, including shingles, pickets, palings, wood, logs, timber, cement; leather goods, including harness, boots and shoes, gloves, and coal.

Let me say that I own a 320-acre dairy and stock farm. Everything I buy on that farm is on the free list and everything that I sell is on a protected list, and that is under a Republican tariff law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. Gentlemen of the committee, this bill which we now have under consideration carries an aggregate appropriation of $526,193,111 for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, and commissions for the fiscal year of 1929, while in the fiscal year 1928 the sum of $533,908,414 was appropriated. The Budget estimate for 1929 is $527,553,802.

There is, therefore, a decrease of $7,715,303 over the same appropriation bill of 1928 and a decrease of $1,360,691 as recommended by the Budget.

The two largest amounts appropriated under this bill are those for the United States Veterans' Bureau, totaling $485,560,000, and the United States Shipping Board, which is $12,288,750.

For the Executive Office the sum of $437,180 is appropriated; Alien Property Custodian, American Battle Monuments Commission, and the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission, $2,300,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman mentions the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What right has the gentleman's Committee on Appropriations to pass legislation raising his salary?

Mr. CULLEN. The Alien Property Custodian's salary is raised on the theory that he is an able man in the right place.

Mr. BLANTON. But what authority has the Committee on Appropriations to pass such legislation?

Mr. CULLEN. Oh, well, the committee recognizes worth and efficiency.

Mr. BLANTON. They did not stop there. They raised another salary in the Shipping Board personnel.

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did they do that? They had no such authority.

Mr. CULLEN. Because he is a very efficient man, and I helped to raise it.

Mr. BLANTON. Are all of our legislative committees going to stop functioning and go home? Is the one big Committee on Appropriations going to do all of the legislative work?

Mr. CULLEN. Not necessarily.

Mr. BLANTON. There is other legislation in the gentleman's bill that I can mention.

Mr. CULLEN. What is it?

Mr. BLANTON. I hope that our friends on the Committee on Appropriations will stop legislating. I hate to make points of order. But when this bill is read under the five-minute rule, I shall be compelled to strike these legislative provisions out of this appropriation bill by making points of order against them.

Mr. CULLEN. Well, there will be time enough for that when the bill is being read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee does put in legislation whenever it wants to, when it thinks it can get by with it.

Mr. CULLEN. I do not know about that, but I believe they should recognize efficiency in any department. I do not believe in cutting away salaries and decreasing efficiency. If we have a good man in the right place, keep him there.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about the merits. I am talking about the committee going beyond its power and trying to legislate instead of appropriating.

Mr. CULLEN. Board of Mediation, $347,902; Board of Tax Appeals, $720,740; Bureau of Efficiency, $210,350; Civil Service Commission, $1,098,752; Commission of Fine Arts, $7,300; Employees' Compensation Commission, $3,675,000; Federal Board of Vocational Education, $853,000; Federal Power Commission, $112,640; Federal Radio Commission, $80,560; Federal Trade Commission, $963,000; General Accounting Office, $3,820,000; Housing Commission, $475,750; Interstate Commerce Commission, $7,654,745; National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, $600,000; Smithsonian Institution, $944,162; Tariff Commission, $754,000; United States Geographic Board, $4,300; United States Shipping Board, $12,288,750; United States Veterans' Bureau, $485,560,000; and in addition, the permanent annual appropriations for 1929 amount to $84,650,250.

In order to have a permanent record and to call the attention of the Members generally to the objects and amounts for which these appropriations are made, I ask unanimous consent to insert herewith a prepared statement thereof.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert herewith a prepared statement concerning some of the details.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. The statements are as follows:

For further information, at the time of the hearings there was left with the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations a detailed itemization of my estimate, which would show by activity each individual item. Should this information not prove sufficient, I will be pleased to have my budget officer call upon you and go into such detail as might be considered necessary.

Very truly yours, FRANK T. HINES, Director.

Mr. CULLEN. Our subcommittee has labored for the past few weeks in session with our esteemed chairman and colleague, Congressman WOOD, and Congressmen WASON, SUMMERS of Washington, and VINSON of Kentucky, and with the cooperation of that stalwart and distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, chairman of our Appropriations Committee, while conducting hearings with the representatives of the various independent offices before our committee. From a general résumé thereof, I believe that the employees of the Federal departments are rendering most efficient and capable service, worthy of much praise and recognition. But I warn the Congress not to reduce too far the needed appropriations for the operation of our governmental agencies, and thus cripple and retard the progress that is being made in bringing about the greatest possible degree of efficiency compatible with the amount of money that is appropriated annually. [Applause.]

The men who left their jobs, their homes and relatives to enlist in defense of the lives and property of the American people in time of war, some of whom were crippled and maimed for life, while others paid the supreme sacrifice, must be well and properly cared for, and adequate and up-to-date hospital facilities provided. This bill seeks $485,560,000 for the Veterans' Bureau, of which amount $31,675,000 is proposed for present hospital purposes, exclusive of personnel, and which amount does not include the appropriation to be reported in the hospital bill now pending before the Veterans' Committee.

I am for an American merchant marine, supported, maintained, and developed along with the other big institutions of this great country. I believe in the principle of Federal aid. We must have a merchant marine capable of transporting our enormous overseas commerce and serving the American people in time of war and distress, when it is absolutely necessary that food and supplies be furnished our forces on land and sea, and act as an auxiliary to the Navy.

Our country ranks about eighth in the shipping business, and although the early founders of this Government advocated and encouraged the building of a large merchant marine, our present shipping business is at the lowest ebb, brought about more by the present prohibitive tariff than by any other cause I know of.

By the act of Congress of date July 4, 1789, a discount of 10 per cent was allowed on all goods in ships owned by American citizens, and a further rebate was allowed on tea imported from the East Indies in American vessels. With such aid and encouragement the tonnage carried in American bottoms increased from 123,893 in 1789, to something over four hundred thousand in 1792. In other words, the percentage of exports and imports increased from 25.6 to 92 per cent. As early as 1840 the British Government adopted the policy of granting subsidies to certain steamship lines, and shortly Italy, France, and the other European countries followed. Presidents Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison strongly advocated relief to the shipping industry, and it was no other than Thomas Jefferson who said:

> To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards; is to form magazines; to multiply useful hands; to produce artists and workmen of every kind who may be found at once for the peaceful speculations of commerce and for the terrible wants of war.

From the year 1831 to 1841, the number of foreign ships in our ports increased over 400 per cent, while during the same period American ships only increased 40 per cent. The British Government in 1834 granted to certain lines a subsidy of $850,000, and in a few years such subsidies were increased from three to four million dollars. It is very significant that those who advocated and initiated the movement to compete in the shipping business with the British lines by granting subsidies, were men of power, leadership, and national influence such as Presidents Jefferson and Polk, and Senator Thomas King of Georgia, and by the largest shipowner of more recent time, A. A. Low, Esq., father of Hon. Seth Low, former mayor of New York and president of Columbia College and of the New York Chamber of Commerce. There was practically no increase in the amount of imports and exports carried in American ships up to the time of the great World War, with the proportion of tonnage transported in American vessels being 8.2 per cent in 1901, while in 1914 it was only 8.6 per cent. The Merchant Marine Commission, established by Congress in 1904, composed of five Senators and five Representatives, with Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire, as chairman, recommended tonnage subsidies on cargo vessels to certain steamship lines to the West Indies, South America, South Africa, Australia, and the Orient, but this provision embodied in the measure that passed the Senate was eliminated in the House.

The Italian Government alone has spent approximately $4,600,000 annually in the construction and operation of their ships and mail lines to China, India, North and East Africa, and Egypt, and France has expended about $13,000,000 a year in the equipment and operation of its various ship lines to Australia, eastern Mediterranean, Brazil, and other countries, while England is also appropriating between seven and eight million dollars every year in aiding and developing her merchant marine.

During the past summer months I had the opportunity of securing first-hand information while in Europe studying the shipping industries of the foreign countries, particularly England, Italy, France, and Germany. All of these countries are now establishing additional shipyards, constructing and equipping vessels to transport the commerce on the high seas.

Italy is building two new ships of twenty-five to thirty thousand tonnage, while France and Germany are also forging ahead under a very large shipbuilding program, reconditioning and thoroughly equipping all their old ships on hand and constructing additional ships. To-day our North American lines are badly in need of two modern vessels of 30,000 tonnage to supply the great demand for additional export passenger, mail, and freight services, along with the Leviathan, George Washington, President Harding, America, President Roosevelt, and the Republic. Sailing of these ships should be made at least three times a week, and thus eliminate the great delay and congestion entailed by sailing only once every 10 days or two weeks.

During the fiscal year 1927, shipments to Europe amounted to the enormous value of $2,397,000,000, or 48 per cent of all our exports, and our imports were $1,268,000,000. Great Britain and Ireland paid about one billion for our products; Italy, $142,000,000; France, $243,000,000; Germany, $443,000,000; and the Netherlands, $143,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman is making a most interesting speech and giving us some valuable information. I am sorry the membership are not giving him their full attention.

Mr. CULLEN. It will all go into the RECORD. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and in order to maintain a feeling of national security in future periods of distress and trouble, we must have a larger fleet of adequate and modern ships and improve our national defense. On November 30, 1927, the United States Fleet Corporation had 266 cargo, 5 passenger, and 9 tanker ships in operation, totaling a fleet of 285 ships. In case of trouble the United States would be forced to spend nearly $3,000,000,000 for the construction of emergency ships, and in the meanwhile American lives would be sacrificed before the ships could be placed in operation. In order that we may balance the North American fleet, the two ships, Mount Vernon and the Monticello, now lying down at Chesapeake Bay, should be repaired, reconditioned, and put in operation, so that sailings could be had at least three times a week.

It was very gratifying to me and to the other members of the committee to know that the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation are being managed and operated on a strictly business basis. They are cutting away expenses where not needed and not reducing in any way the efficiency of its operations. They have practiced for the last year the strictest kind of economy, and that is what the Congress of the United States expects, as well as the people of the country.

I am fully convinced that the wisest and best policy is to have shipyards and train men to become proficient and experienced shipbuilders, as this feature of our ship program is just as important to the upbuilding of a merchant marine for reconditioning and repair in order that our ships can be kept up to that high standard worthy of the merchant marine of a great country and place our business at least on a par with that of the foreign nations. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, we have listened to a very important discussion this afternoon in reference to the resolution that was read before the House referring to the tariff. I could not find myself in favor of that resolution, because it proposes to reduce the tariff. I come from an agricultural district in Minnesota. The need of the farmers there is to increase the tariff rate on a considerable number of competitive agricultural products.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELVIG. In a minute. In the year 1926 there were competitive agricultural imports shipped into this country aggregating in value one billion and a half dollars, and for the purpose of protecting our farmers against importations of this nature I am in favor of increasing the tariff rates on all such products at the present time.

Reference was also made in the debate this afternoon to the conditions which existed in the year 1914, at the time when the war in Europe began. At that time we were operating under the tariff act of 1913, and had that continued, without the increased demand for food and the higher prices realized during the war time, the situation we were left in in 1920, so far as the farmers were concerned, would have been much worse than it was. The emergency tariff act assisted the farmers in regaining their markets at the close of the war.

It may be that there are some schedules in our present tariff act that are too high, so far as the industrial and manufacturing schedules are concerned, and I hope this matter will be made a subject of investigation, and at the present session of Congress, at the initiative of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now there is one more point that I wish to bring up, and that is with reference to the cost of farm machinery. There is no doubt that at the present time the cost of farm machinery is higher than it was formerly. I had occasion not long ago to talk with a member of a very prominent manufacturing concern producing binders, and I asked him what the most important factor in the production of binders was, and he informed me that it was labor.

I was informed that a binder involved in its total cost a labor item of between 82 and 84 per cent, which will account for the increased price of binders to-day. According to the June, 1927, earnings of New York factory workers, labor has increased 135 per cent over the level of labor wages during the period before the war, so that we have an explanation with reference to the increased labor cost of machinery. The increased cost is due to the labor that enters into the manufacture of such machinery and the increased cost, therefore, is not a tariff element.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind yielding for a question?

Mr. SELVIG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] said that the farmers of the country knew who their friends were and indicated they are not complaining. If they are not complaining, and if there is not a general discontent on behalf of agriculture all over the country, I want to ask the gentleman why did the President do his summering in South Dakota?

Mr. SELVIG. He went there because he found that was a good place to go, and wished to spend the summer there.

Mr. BLANTON. It was to alleviate this discontent as far as he could, was it not?

Mr. SELVIG. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman can square that with his conscience.

Mr. SELVIG. I visited the President in South Dakota last summer, and found he had selected the most wonderful place for his summer residence, and I hope the President will come West next summer.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman that I heard the Governor of South Dakota here in Washington assert that, in his judgment, the tariff ought to be revised downward on things that the farmer uses. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. SELVIG. The great need at the present time, as far as the tariff is concerned, is to increase the schedules on competitive agricultural products. [Applause.] That is the first thing.

Mr. BLANTON. But how about revising it downward on all of the things the farmer must buy? That would help farmers.

Mr. SELVIG. We have on the free list a very large proportion of the things the farmer purchases. [Applause.] In addition to increasing the tariff on competitive agricultural schedules, we should also make the tariff effective on our surplus crops through the enactment of a bill similar to the one introduced at the last session by Chairman HAUGEN, of our Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. But my friend heard that table of 17 different farm implements that my friend from Kansas testified as costing more down in Kansas, under the present tariff act, from one-third to double what they cost the farmer under the Underwood tariff law.

Mr. SELVIG. I pointed out a few moments ago that, as far as the cost of a binder is concerned, the labor element entering into the cost of the manufacture of a binder approximates between 82 and 84 per cent, so that the increased cost of labor has therefore made the increased cost of farm machinery.

Mr. BLANTON. But that does not reduce the amount the farmer has to pay for it?

Mr. SELVIG. No; it does not do that. However, we can not attribute that to the tariff. The inference this afternoon was that the tariff is the cause of that increase.

Mr. BLANTON. The farmer wants some relief himself.

Mr. SELVIG. The farmer needs to get a better price for himself, and if we have an increased tariff on competitive agricultural products, that will give him that increased price. So will the Federal farm board if that legislation is enacted, as I expect it to be during this Congress.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELVIG. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman stated a while ago that he voted to table the tariff resolution because of its demand for a revision downward.

Mr. SELVIG. A revision downward, and the great need for competitive agricultural products is a revision upward.

Mr. KVALE. As I recall, the resolution provided for a revision downward of the excessive rates, and the Senator from South Dakota who introduced the resolution in the Senate is not in favor, so far as I know, of a revision downward on agricultural imports, nor are we of the West in favor of such a revision. We are in favor of a revision of the tariff on the implements and the other things a farmer has to buy, and for which he pays an excessive price to-day.

Mr. SELVIG. As far as I am concerned, the resolution that was passed by the Senate was unfortunate in its terminology, in that it states that the tariff schedules are to be revised downward, and I am against a revision of the agricultural schedules downward.

Mr. KVALE. The Senator from South Dakota is not in favor of that, nor am I.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELVIG. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Does my colleague know of a single agricultural implement that is not on the free list? All agricultural implements are on the free list, are they not?

Mr. SELVIG. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. So that the statement just made, that the farmer is paying a duty upon agricultural implements, is not justified?

Mr. KVALE. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that many of the things which enter into the manufacture of these implements are not on the free list.

Mr. NEWTON. I got the impression that the gentleman thought the farmer was paying a duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. KVALE. I am not speaking of agricultural implements only, but of these other things which enter into their manufacture.

Mr. NEWTON. However, the gentleman has not answered my question. Will not the gentleman state frankly to the House that under the tariff law as it now stands agricultural implements are on the free list?

Mr. KVALE. But the gentleman knows that many of the things entering into the manufacture of those implements are not on the free list, which amounts to the same thing.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must suggest that the gentleman has asked for a very limited time, and that the older Members are taking most of his time from him.

Mr. BLANTON. He is able to take care of himself.

Mr. TILSON. He has taken care of himself very well so far as the gentleman from Texas is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. And he could do it as to the gentleman from Connecticut, and he does not need him.

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, to-day, January 17, 1928, is the two hundred and twenty-second anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin. At least we are reasonably certain that he first saw light on the 17th of January, 1706, although strong claims are made that January 6 is the correct date. Upon investigation I found that the weight of opinion favored January 17.

This decision was probably influenced, in part, by the fact that January 6 is past and that to wait a whole year before delivering this speech would be too great a hardship to bear.

Benjamin Franklin has fittingly been called the first typical American. He was born of an immigrant father but would be a typical American if he lived to-day.

He is affectionately regarded as one of our greatest men. By many he is ranked as the greatest of all Americans. He is undoubtedly entitled to a place among the greatest men that have lived.

His talents and interests were many. Great as a philosopher and scientist, successful as a publisher, capable as a politician and diplomatist, and renowned as a writer, he added glory to the name of America throughout the entire world.

He is the father of the public library. He is the founder of the city police and fire department systems of American cities. His efforts led to the establishment of the first public hospital. He, in part, at least, may be said to be the leader in establishing the State university as a part of America's great contributions to education.

These achievements, if there were no others, would entitle him not only to America's gratitude but to the plaudits of humanity at large.

But there is more to be added. He was successful in business and attended strictly to it, but did not permit business to possess his soul. His humor has delighted millions.

Benjamin Franklin's crowning achievement, however, lies not in his business success nor in his writings. His was the opportunity to give service, unmatched in brilliancy, resourcefulness, and achievement, to his country in foreign courts.

During those trying years when our country's founders struggled and fought to bring forth a new nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," Franklin was in Europe, where, undismayed by innumerable setbacks and disasters, he, smilingly and hopefully, day after day hung on. He won a place in the affections of all and secured the help without which all would have been lost.

Franklin lived to see these thirteen Colonies "hang together, and not separately," as he at one time feared they would, and become a nation.

On April 17, 1790, at the ripe old age of 84, he passed away, honored, respected, and loved by all the peoples of the civilized world.

To-day I shall not attempt to portray his life nor to recount his great achievements. I merely desire to call to the attention of the Members of the House Benjamin Franklin's devotion to truth, to facing the facts as they were, and to emphasize his greatest service, which lay in his ability to meet the situations that arose during those critical years in our Nation's life and to solve the problems that confronted our country.

He had an unerring instinct for facts, and a guiding principle of his eventful life was to use facts upon which to base his conclusions.

Facts and truth are not always easily found. A great American of our day, Mr. Owen D. Young, in characteristic form expressed this in the following words:

> Facts can be applied in any field. Our curse is ignorance. Facts are our scarcest raw material. This is shown by the economy with which we use them, because they are as difficult to get as they are precious to have.

Agriculture presents one of the most difficult fields in which to secure facts that may prove to be of value in analyzing the problems confronting our farmers. But we must have them and they must be presented in order that our farming class may be encouraged and aided in their great task.

All are agreed that agriculture is one of our Nation's most fundamental interests. The statesmen of every age have ever exalted the tillers of the soil, the producers of life's necessities, who, year in and year out, through unremitting toil, plough, sow, and harvest that our people may be fed and clothed.

George Washington, in a letter to the Marquis de Lafayette, written at Mount Vernon January 29, 1789, emphasized the transcending importance of agriculture, and extolled its handmaid—industry. In this letter he expresses his conviction that both should go forward together, that industry should be encouraged, but with "no diminution in agriculture" and not "to the prejudice of agriculture."

In this letter he displayed the rare statesmanship that always characterized his views. Modern-day statesmen, grappling with the acute agricultural problems that were left us as a heritage of the World War, can well take note of his words.

In his address to both Houses of Congress, January 8, 1790, George Washington indicates his interest in the country's welfare when he said:

> The advancement of agriculture (which he placed first), commerce, and manufactures, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation.

In all his writings and in his work George Washington, the father of our country, showed the keenest interest in agriculture, which he held was the foundation of our national weal.

George Washington, too, had a good word to say for the West. He early sensed the potential importance of that vast region, destined to become the world's greatest food-producing region.

In a letter to Richard Henderson, written from Mount Vernon, June 19, 1788, he wrote:

> If I was a young man, just preparing to begin the world, or if advanced in life and had a family to make a provision for, I know of no country where I should rather fix my habitation than in some part of that region.

To-day, amidst the great wealth and prosperity of our industrial sections, his invitation to go West does not carry with it the appeal of those words spoken 140 years ago. His admonition that agriculture, first, and commerce and industry should go forward hand in hand has been neglected.

Agriculture trails in the dust. Modern invention, organizing genius, and an industrial-minded statesmanship have permitted agriculture to lag far, far behind.

There is a suggestion in Washington's words that should be heeded in the United States to-day. To provide equal opportunity for the farmer is one of the great tasks that confront present-day statesmanship.

In 1859, on September 20, at Milwaukee, Wis., another of the world's great men spoke words of wisdom and truth with reference to agriculture. He was none other than a tall, lanky Illinois lawyer, Abraham Lincoln, who had been invited to address the members of the Wisconsin State Agricultural Society at their annual meeting.

In this address Lincoln coined a phrase which has gone around the world, "Every blade of grass is a study; and to produce two where there was but one is both a profit and a pleasure."

It should be so even to-day. But, alas, it is not. Overproduction and the surplus have become the bugbears of our agricultural economy. The law of supply and demand, twisted and torn through legislative enactments and the power of organization, has been set aside for all excepting the lone, unorganized, largely unaided, individualistic farmer.

Millions for production, not one cent for control. Education to produce two blades of grass where but one grew before, but 'nary a gesture even to aid the farmer in stabilizing prices that will enable him to meet the increasing costs, taxes, interest, and transportation charges. This is the condition in which the farmers find themselves to-day.

Legislation involving indirect price fixing for labor, commerce, banking, industry, and transportation, but nothing to smoothen the path for the farmers. No one can successfully deny that this is the true situation to-day.

Shades of Abe Lincoln! What an indictment against our enlightened age!

Lincoln's conception of the dignity and worth of agriculture brought forth, upon this same occasion, these words:

> This leads me to the further reflection that no other human occupation opens so wide a field for the profitable and agreeable combination of labor with cultivated thought, as agriculture.

This should be as true to-day as when these memorable words were spoken in 1859. But the farmer can not live on noble sentiment alone. He must secure a profit for his time and capital. He must be given the benefit of a favorable governmental policy. He, too, must be relieved of some of the crushing burdens that bear down on him so heavily. The discussions in this House bear abundant testimony to the handicaps under which our present-day agriculture suffers.

Nearly 68 years ago Lincoln made another statement in which there is a prophetic note. This, too, was a part of his Madison address. He said:

> It also follows that that interest [referring to agriculture] is most worthy of all to be cherished and cultivated—that if there be inevitable conflict between that interest and any other, the other should yield.

This leads up to the situation to-day. Realizing that facts are our "scarcest raw material" and that "one has to dig deep for them," I have been delving into agricultural statistics for the purpose of throwing a little light, if possible, on the problem. To-day, for agriculture's sake, facts are "precious to have." They must be secured if we are to help solve the problem that confronts us.

There have been many investigations of late to ascertain the true status of agriculture and to determine in which direction, as a nation, we are going.

These investigations have been, in the main, fruitful of results. In considering the facts which have been disclosed, I would emphasize to-day Franklin's devotion to truth, Washington's inherent conviction as to the importance of agriculture, and Lincoln's declaration that the people of our country should put no other gods before them.

I repeat his memorable words—

> That if there be inevitable conflict between that interest (agriculture) and any other, that other should yield.

What is more fitting than on this birthday anniversary of that practical man, that far-seeing statesman, that constructive politician, that searcher for truth, Benjamin Franklin, that we join in spending a few moments to consider our greatest and most urgent national problem, the rehabilitation of agriculture.

In this busy, hurry-scurry world of ours, with its "madding crowd," its noise and jazz, its political opportunism and hypocritical gestures, it is worth while to let the words of Washington and Lincoln sink into our consciousness if only for a fleeting second.

Statesmanship of the highest order must be focussed on the farmers' problems. One objective should be held in view, that of establishing a forward-looking national policy for agriculture. This great task confronts the Nation to-day. Nineteen hundred and twenty-eight can be made an epochal year in our history if a beginning is made in solving this problem.

There are only a few people who are willing to leave the solution of the agricultural problem to natural laws. Supply and demand has been drastically disturbed by the industrial policy of the Government.

It is well to be reminded that Washington believed the Nation's policy should encourage agriculture, commerce, and industry to go forward together. Lincoln urged that in any conflict with any other interest agriculture should be given the right of way. Those words apply to-day with even greater emphasis than in 1788 and 1859, when they were spoken.

We have witnessed since 1920 the transfer of thirteen billions of wealth from the country to the city. The farmers, unaided, were powerless to prevent this transfer of their capital wealth. They needed the strong arm of the Government to protect them from the increased burdens placed on them by restrictive immigration legislation, by increased taxes, by greatly increased interest charges on a stupendous farm indebtedness, by the higher cost of commodities, by increased transportation costs, all of which they had to meet during a period when the decreased purchasing power of European countries was an additional handicap.

Agriculture is carried on by six and one-half million independent competing units, differing in kind of production, location, and always confronted with the ravages of flood, drought, frost, winds, insect, fungi, and animal diseases, and subject to the price-depressing effects of any surplus production that fair wind and weather bring.

Statistical evidence—

According to Dr. G. F. Warren, of Cornell University, admitted to be one of our Nation's soundest farm economists—> indicates that we are in the eighth year of the most serious agricultural depression ever known in the United States. The depression involves primarily the food producers of staple foods.

In June, 1927, quoting from Government statistics, farm prices were 149 per cent above the pre-war level, retail prices 172 per cent above, and the earnings of New York factory workers 235 per cent above this same level.

This is one of the "facts" referred to by Mr. Owen D. Young as "our scarcest raw material." It is a fact to which those who have been intrusted with the solemn duty of national lawmaking should give sympathetic and constructive consideration.

Students of the agricultural situation have analyzed the factors which enter into the dimunition of farm income which began in 1920 and continues to be with us.

Again I quote from Doctor Warren's clear and logical study. In two tables he has presented estimates of the proportion of the agricultural depression that was due to (a) increased interest payments, (b) tax payments, (c) overproduction, and (d) the discrepancy between farm and retail prices. The years 1921 and 1926 were used in this investigation.

In 1921, according to these estimates, 52 per cent of the depression was due to the low prices received by the producers of 36 food products in a comparison to the retail prices of the same commodities, 34 per cent to overproduction, 10 per cent to increased tax payments, and 4 per cent to increased interest payments.

TABLE I.—Estimated relative importance of various factors in the agricultural depression of food producers for the year 1921

[Based on prices for December 1]

Factors	Loss to food producers	Per cent
Increased interest payments	[1] $145,000,000	4
Increased tax payments	[1] 353,000,000	10
Overproduction	1,170,000,000	34
Discrepancy in farm and retail prices	1,760,000,000	52
Total	3,428,000,000	100

[1] Since food production represents about 75 per cent of the total output of agriculture, this percentage of the total increase in interest and tax payments is used.

In 1926, according to his estimates, 55 per cent of the depression was due to low prices received by the farmers in comparison with the retail prices, only 20 per cent was due to overproduction, the proportion of the depression that was due to increased tax payments was 18 per cent and to increased interest payments 7 per cent.

[Based on prices for December 1]

Factors	Loss to food producers	Per cent
Increased interest payments	$145,000,000	7
Increased tax payments	353,000,000	18
Overproduction	400,000,000	20
Discrepancy between farm and retail prices	1,080,000,000	55
Total	1,978,000,000	100

These very significant data are impressive. They refute the most commonly voiced expression that the farmers themselves are to blame; that all their woes have come as a result of overproduction.

Overproduction as a factor has been reduced from 34 per cent in 1921 to 20 per cent in 1926. Increased interest payments continue to demand a heavy share, having increased from 4 per cent in 1921 to 7 per cent in 1926 as a factor in farm depression. The farm tax burden increased as a factor from 10 per cent in 1921 to 18 per cent in 1926.

The crux of the entire situation is the continuance of the discrepancy between farm and retail prices as a factor. In 1921 this discrepancy was responsible for 52 per cent of the agricultural depression, which increased to 55 per cent in 1926.

Present prices have resulted in a decline in food production, and an even greater decline looms large in the future. The present actute shortage of beef cattle is incontrovertible evidence of effects of the low price level through which that industry passed a few years ago.

Constructive statesmanship requires a careful consideration of facts. It is not enough to let affairs drift along, leading to no one knows where.

There has been so much said about overproduction that the general public has been led to believe that it is the cause of all the farmers' ills.

I would not in this presence undertake to minimize any constructive effort which seeks to adjust production to effective consumptive demand. I would, however, point out the difficulties that are in the way to bring this about when you consider that there are six and one-half millions of farm units, and that weather, season, and rainfall, if you please, are the most potent factors in production, overshadowing greatly the influence of acreage and even of price.

There is one phase of this problem to which I would call the attention of the Members of the House, because it involves the results of governmental policy. This is the indirect effect on our domestic output and the price caused by the importation into the United States of a great volume of competitive agricultural products. The governmental tariff policy which permits the annual importation of $1,500,000,000 of competitive agricultural imports is directly inimical to the interests of our domestic producers of these products.

The tariff can be made to be of greater direct benefit to our farming class. I state this with a great appreciation of the benefits that accrue from the present tariff act, both directly in the adequate duties on a few of our farm products, and those that come indirectly in assisting our consumers in maintaining the high standard of living that prevails in the United States.

I offer two suggestions at this time with respect to our tariff policy that if adopted would be of assured benefit to the farmers of the Nation.

In the first place, let us make it possible for our farmers to produce with profit here in our own land at least $1,000,000,000 in value of farm products which are now annually imported and which can be produced to advantage here. It will be necessary to rewrite a few of our agricultural tariff schedules in order to assist the farmers in this undertaking.

I do not intend to-day to go into detail regarding this proposal. It requires, however, no argument to show that if our farmers receive protection which would be adequate and effective that they would then be in a position to produce those competitive imports which are sold here. The result would be that a part at least of the overproduction factor with reference to other crops or commodities would be removed. In other words, our farmers by tariff readjustment would then be enabled to dispose of these agricultural products for which there is a domestic demand on a domestic price basis, instead of being compelled to dispose of them at prices to meet the ever-increasing foreign importations.

The present rates on many of our competitive agricultural products are too low. This fact is well known to the Members of the House.

The many requests to increase these rates that have been presented to the Tariff Commission during the last five years, each supported by data which justify higher rates, indicate the widespread interest that prevails.

I desire to call to your attention a bill which I introduced in the House yesterday, which provides increases in a few of the agricultural tariff schedules. I invite the attention of the Members of the House not only to this bill but to a score of other bills which have been introduced by my distinguished colleagues which provide for increased rates on many other agricultural schedules.

The bill which I introduced includes products of considerable importance to the farmers. These are dairy and poultry products, potatoes and potato starch, buckwheat, clover seeds, turnips, hay, flaxseed, and copra.

Imports of these products, aggregating $128,728,000 in 1926, were admitted into the United States in direct competition with domestic producers. The increased rate of duty that is proposed in this bill for these products is equivalent to about 40 per cent ad valorem, which is less than the average ad valorem rates in the so-called industrial and manufactures schedules of the present tariff act.

The proposed rates are not submitted as the last word on the subject. The schedules are presented in order that all interested may study them. This can result in but the one conclusion that the Members of the House will be convinced of their reasonableness and at the proper time will enact them into law as a measure of justice for our farmers.

Before I specify in detail the changes proposed in the bill, I desire to quote briefly from a statement issued on December 27, 1927, by Chairman Edgar B. Brossard, of the United States Tariff Commission, in which he discusses the agricultural imports that are coming into the United States in ever-increasing volume each year:

> The farmers have asked the Tariff Commission for increases in the duties on their respective farm products. What they seem to want is adequate protection for their farm products in this enormous home market. And they want to get that protection without destroying the purchasing power of the consumers, of farm products in the industrial and commercial centers of this their home market.

I beg to submit that the farmers do not merely "seem" to want adequate protection for their farm products. They demand it. They are weary of waiting for the commission to act. In most cases, also, the rates must be increased beyond the limitation Congress has fixed for any increase the commission might grant.

The farmers come to the Congress of the United States requesting that justice be done them and that they get a square deal. They ask that the great Ways and Means Committee of this House set a time for hearings on these schedules in the near future.

As stated before, other Members of the House have introduced bills to increase the duties on various farm products, all of which should receive the early and careful consideration of this body.

The readjustment of many of the agricultural tariff schedules is one step necessary in rebuilding our agriculture.

In the second place, it is well known to all that the tariff is ineffective on many of our surplus crops and commodities and only partially effective on some. This presents a problem requiring immediate legislative action. To accomplish what is needed, the farmers have united in requesting that governmental machinery be set up for the purpose of stabilizing the price on these crops and commodities. The Members of Congress are familiar with plans that have been proposed for the control of the surplus. It is gratifying to note that those holding divergent views regarding this problem are now nearer an agreement with respect to proposed legislation than at any time in the past.

In my humble opinion, it would be nothing short of a calamity for this Congress to adjourn without passing this legislation, which is regarded as absolutely essential in the effort to rehabilitate our agriculture. We are in the eighth year of a most serious agricultural depression. There are no signs of any substantial improvement, viewing the situation as a whole.

The factors causing the depression have been studied by persons in all walks of life. The Business Men's Commission, in their recently issued report, after a most searching inquiry, admit that the surplus is a price-depressing factor of major importance. They suggest a plan for its solution.

The farmers themselves have studied the problem for several years. They believe that the commission's plan is inadequate. They, too, have proposed a plan. In this plan the producers themselves will be required to bear the entire expense that will be involved in the administration of the act. There are no revolutionary theories involved at all. The plan simply authorizes a Government board to perfect a 100 per cent farm-commodity organization for each of the products of which we produce a surplus, in order that the costs of handling this surplus, and the benefits that will be derived from such control, may be equitably distributed among all the producers of that commodity.

If these two suggestions which have been briefly sketched could be put into operation at once in order that their effectiveness may be demonstrated, further study should then be given to the other tariff schedules which through legislative enactment have materially increased the costs of commodities which the farmers must buy.

I am a believer in the protective tariff system. There is no doubt in my mind that it has materially aided the United States to attain its present enviable position in industry and that it has proved to be of some value to agriculture.

If there are industrial and manufactures schedules in the present tariff act which can be lowered, for the benefit of agriculture, this should be done. This phase of the problem requires further study and painstaking investigation which I sincerely trust will be made during this session of Congress.

The inadequacy of our tariff in respect to agriculture and, in addition, the results of the policy of restricting immigration are important factors in the present agricultural depression. They have tended to widen the spread between what the farmers receive for their products and what they pay for the commodities that they must buy. This disparity, in addition to the difference between the farm price and the retail price of food, is greater than many are led to believe.

Increased transportation rates, bolstered up by Federal legislation, are also an important factor in the prevailing disparity. The unprecedented increase in taxes, amounting on the averages to about one-third of the farmers' cash income, is another factor. While this is largely the result of increases in local and State taxes, it creates a factor that must be considered, for the taxes must be paid. Taxes must be paid, and they can be met only out of the cash income the farmer receives. As the farmers' purchasing power has been greatly diminished, the tax burden is thereby correspondingly increased.

I have briefly touched upon a few of the factors which must be given consideration in a study of the farm situation in the United States.

I was prompted to prepare these remarks as a result of reading a recently published life of Benjamin Franklin. His genius lay in securing facts upon which to base his conclusions and in his unerring instinct for initiating practical means of doing things, even though they were at the time new and untried. This made him a leader in establishing institutions and services which have proved their worth and have been a blessing to all mankind.

Our approach to the solution of the farm problem should be made in the same spirit. A condition, not a theory, confronts us. Our great agricultural population is in distress. For eight long years they have cried out for help. Their problems deserve and must secure consideration that will again place agriculture into its rightful place of economic equality.

Let us get the facts. Let us face the great national problem that confronts us. Let us pass adequate and effective legislation that will insure for us and our posterity the benefits that will come in a land where agriculture, industry, and commerce march forward together in even rank to the national greatness that lies in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I have a resolution I want the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. For information?

Mr. PALMISANO. I am offering a resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. That is entirely out of order.

Mr. PALMISANO. I understand we have that right under general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. In his own time the gentleman can ask the Clerk to read it, for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be read for information, but to offer a resolution is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. He has the right to have it read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. But that is not what the gentleman is asking.

Mr. PALMISANO. Then I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman is simply asking that this document be read in his own time.

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas John F. J. Herbert, prohibition administrator for the Maryland-District of Columbia area, did on or about the 20th day of April, 1927, sanction and approve the practices of prohibition agents serving under him in blackjacking citizens; and

Whereas he has promoted Prohibition Agent Robert E. Beall, who had been indicted by the grand jury of the State of Maryland for assaulting and beating two women; and

Whereas he has in his department one Harry C. Wimbley, as an undercover buyer, who had been convicted of the crime of robbery and sentenced to six years to the Maryland Penitentiary; said Wimbley has since been indicted by the grand jury of the State of Maryland for assault with intent to kill and carrying a deadly weapon, on which charge the United States attorney for the district of Maryland is defending him at the request of Prohibition Administrator John F. J. Herbert; and

Whereas one Joseph R. Brewer, prohibition agent, operating under said John F. J. Herbert, with three other agents, was indicted for the murder of Charles V. Gunlacht, a 73-year-old farmer, who had protested their entering his premises without a search warrant; and

Whereas the said Joseph R. Brewer who was the principal in the said killing was permitted by the said John F. J. Herbert to continue in the service, and particularly he was permitted to make further raids: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint five Members of the House to investigate the methods employed by the prohibition administrator for the Maryland-District of Columbia area in employing agents, undercover men, and others in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, the retaining of men in the department charged with crimes and the protecting of them by having the United States attorney for the district of Maryland to defend them. The said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to conduct such inquiries at such times and places as the committee may deem necessary, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths and affirmations, and compel the attendance of witnesses. And the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, out of the contingent fund, for the purpose of making effective the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting some correspondence I have had with the Prohibition Commissioner.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the gentleman if the whereases that are contained in his resolution are his own whereases or do they purport to be facts coming from somebody else which the gentleman is stating on hearsay?

Mr. PALMISANO. They are facts that I have gotten through correspondence with the Prohibition Commissioner and from newspaper reports.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not such things that the gentleman could swear are true on his own personal responsibility, are they? Does the gentleman know they are true?

Mr. PALMISANO. I have not investigated them all, but I will say that I have correspondence with the Prohibition Commissioner dating back to April 21, 1927.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is all hearsay, so far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; like all such matters. I can not say I have made a personal investigation, but I would ask that the Members read this correspondence I have had with the commissioner to show that I have tried to be fair in my dealings on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

APRIL 21, 1927.

Gen. LINCOLN C. ANDREWS,

Prohibition Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have recently noticed in the Baltimore press that the prohibition agents operating under Prohibition Administrator

John F. J. Herbert have been very active with their guns and blackjacks, and according to the inclosed clipping of the Baltimore News of April 21, 1927, Administrator Herbert sanctions the strong-arm methods.

You will note that the agents involved were charged with using a blackjack on a prisoner and then with the attempt of trying to hug and kiss the prisoner's wife. To the charge of using the blackjack the agents attempted to blame their subordinate, their chauffeur, one Edward L. Boone. Boone, in turn, denied that he had used the blackjack and claimed that the agents were trying to make him the goat. To the charge of attempting to hug and kiss the prisoner's wife, the agents' defense was that they were just kidding and were mixing a little fun with their work.

It seems to me by their action in denying the charge and attempting to place it on their chauffeur they showed conclusively that they were not justified in using the blackjack, and their explanation of the kissing of the prisoner's wife is ridiculous and utter nonsense.

Notwithstanding their action, Mr. Herbert has sanctioned their methods and in so doing Mr. Herbert has proven without a doubt that he is not the proper person nor are the agents proper persons to administer the prohibition law.

I do not know of any law that justifies an officer of the law to attempt to maim any prisoner unless the officer's life is in danger, and in this case neither of them claimed that their life was in danger.

I therefore respectfully request that you ask for the resignation of Mr. Herbert and the agents involved in this episode as it is in this way alone that the people of Maryland can be made to feel that the law is being honestly and intelligently enforced, and is not a mere cloak for the operation of persons who would bring the Government into disrepute.

Very respectfully yours,

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

Hon. VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of the 21st and will have an investigation made as to the facts in the matter you bring to my attention in connection with Administrator Herbert's conduct of office. When I have the facts before me, I will be able to answer your letter more intelligently.

Very truly yours,

L. C. ANDREWS, Assistant Secretary.

Gen. LINCOLN C. ANDREWS,
Prohibition Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: On April 21, 1927, I called your attention to the brutal treatment of certain prisoners by the prohibition agents operating in Maryland and the sanction of such treatment by Prohibition Administrator John F. J. Herbert.

Although more than a month has elapsed since you promised an investigation, I have heard nothing. Meanwhile the agents and Mr. Herbert continue to treat the public with disrespect.

I noticed in the Baltimore press of May 6 and 7 that several prominent citizens of Baltimore advised you to ignore my complaint because it was made for political purposes. May I say in this connection that I do not know Mr. Herbert nor do I know his politics. My complaint is based on the newspaper account of the affair, and if these prominent gentlemen will give to the press facts to show that the report was wrong, I will be the first person to apologize to Mr. Herbert and his agents.

Will you kindly let me know if the investigation is completed and what is the finding as to my complaint? If the finding is adverse to me, will you let me have a copy of the report?

Very truly yours,

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

JUNE 16, 1927.

Hon. VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PALMISANO: I have carefully looked over the papers in the Jasco case and given consideration to your statement relative to the treatment of certain prisoners by agents operating under Administrator John F. J. Herbert, Baltimore, Md.

I am strongly of the opinion that there was some exaggeration in the early reports on these matters which you received, and I believe that extended inquiry has shown that the work of the men under Colonel Herbert was generally creditable to Federal officers. The difficulties of the work are, of course, apparent to us all. The use of blackjacks appears to be legal, inasmuch as the Maryland State law prohibiting their use especially exempts officers of State, county, or city.

I am of the opinion that Colonel Herbert is following very closely the actions of his men and can be relied upon to impose conduct on the part of his officers that is not only correct but will meet with the approval of the judicial officials before whom the cases are tried.

Very sincerely yours,

J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition.

BALTIMORE, MD., June 20, 1927.

Hon. J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: I wish to acknowledge yours of the 16th instant in which you state that you have carefully looked into the Jasco case and were of the opinion that there was some exaggeration in the early reports and that extended inquiry has shown that the work of the man under Colonel Herbert was generally creditable to Federal officers. You seem to justify the use of blackjacks because the Maryland State law prohibiting their use exempts officers of the State, county, or city. While it is true that the Maryland State law exempts State and city officers, no State or city officers are permitted to use blackjacks except in self-defense.

The people of Maryland desire to know did the agents use the blackjack or was it Boone, the chauffeur, and if the agents did use the blackjack, why did they blame Boone for using it?

I do not believe that the people will have any faith in Colonel Herbert unless you can explain the denial by the agents before United States Commissioner Supplee and the final acquittal of Jasco.

Since Colonel Herbert has been in charge he has encouraged his agents to use violent tactics, and he has treated the best of our citizens with contempt. The agents always have their hands on their guns ready to pull the trigger upon the least provocation. The attitude of Colonel Herbert is again shown when, on March 29, 1927, he stated that an investigation was not necessary when a man by the name of Hicks was shot by an alleged agent, notwithstanding the fact that the same agent has previously been brought before the United States court for murder.

The attitude of Colonel Herbert is that the agents' word is preferred to any other citizen, no matter what his standing in the community.

Very sincerely yours,

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

P. S. You will pardon me for making these letters public, but I am compelled, as the people in this State are following closely the final outcome.

No reply.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1927.

Hon. J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: Some months ago I brought to your attention certain charges against Col. John F. J. Herbert, prohibition director for Maryland. In further justification of my request made at that time for his removal, I call your attention to another instance of his unfitness.

The facts of this instance were developed in the hearing of the case of the State of Maryland v. Robert E. Beall, eastern police station of Baltimore, August 23, 1927, a stenographic copy the testimony therein being inclosed herewith.

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1927.

Hon. VINCENT L. PALMISANO, M. C.,
Baltimore, Md.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of September 2, inclosing transcript of testimony taken in the case of State of Maryland v. Robert E. Beall, August 23, 1927.

I have read over the record personally and it is my opinion that the facts as related by the various witnesses do not present a very clear picture of what actually occurred. I find upon inquiry that the entire matter has been transferred to the Federal court, and I am sure that you would not seek a final determination on a matter of this sort which is still pending in court.

Very sincerely yours,

J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition.

Reply.

BALTIMORE, MD., September 13, 1927.

Hon. J. M. DORAN,
Commissioner of Prohibition, Washington, D. C.

MR. COMMISSIONER: I wish to acknowledge yours of the 8th instant in reply to my letter of the 2d instant, in which I requested the removal of Colonel Herbert and several agents who were charged with assault. In reply, I wish to state that I am exceedingly sorry to see the attitude that you have taken in this matter. I especially call your attention to Agent Robert E. Beall, who has been in numerous assault charges and has for the second time been indicted by the grand jury of the State of Maryland, which cases will be or have been transferred to the Federal court on the claim that the agent was a Federal officer.

In Maryland when a State officer is indicted for an alleged crime that particular officer is suspended pending the final hearing. It seems to me that if the Federal Government expects the citizens of the State of Maryland to have any respect at all for the Volstead Act and the agents, the Government should insist upon the agents enforcing the law in an orderly manner, and whenever an agent is charged with an alleged crime that particular agent after an indictment should be suspended until a final hearing, and if convicted of the crime with which he is accused dismissed, and, on the other hand, if not convicted he should be reinstated with pay. That, in my judgment, is the only way you will have the citizens to respect the Volstead Act and the agents.

Very truly yours,

VINCENT L. PALMISANO.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House may differ as to the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment, but it seems to me that we are all in accord in that as long as the Volstead Act is on the statute books, the Government is to enforce it and enforce it only in a peaceful and orderly manner, and we ought to notify the Prohibition Department in the various States that we will not tolerate the high-jacket enforcement as has been done throughout the country. The thing that is being done and encouraged by the gentleman who has charge of the Maryland-District of Columbia area is being done throughout the United States. To give an illustration of how much he thinks of the lives of our citizens—when a man was shot by an agent on March 28, 1927, he says, that an investigation was not necessary, but, on the other hand, when the State road commissioner of Maryland protested against the agents throwing glass on the State roads he apologized to the State road chairman and stated that it would not occur again. In other words, he has placed the damage to an automobile tire above that of a human being. But not only has that hapened in Maryland; I kindly refer you to a case in Virginia where a minister's daughter driving along in the night was shot because she would not stop at the request of an agent whose identity the young lady did not know. The same thing applies in North Carolina, where a milkman was shot because he did not stop at the request of an unidentified agent; and also in Detroit, where a girl (11 years of age) was killed because she, with her father, was in the way of one of the rum chasers. Put yourself in the position of the 73-year-old farmer who was shot down by Agent Brewer, with the assistance of three others, all of whom were from 25 to 35 years of age, coming on your premises without a warrant when requested to keep off the grounds refused to do so, pulled out their weapons and shot at this unfortunate. Then at the preliminary hearing Brewer is held without bail, he being the principal, and when the case is transferred to the United States District Court the district attorney and the prohibition administrator of Maryland has his bail reduced to $10,000, one of the agents was dismissed, one was held on $2,000, and one on $1,000. Why the necessity of holding Brewer under $10,000 unless there is a a prima facie case against this man Brewer, who, according to the paper, was suspended by Herbert and later on permitted to assist in raids, and when Herbert was questioned by the State's attorney of the county as to whether or not he was assisting the agents he evaded the question and Mr. Dorsey had to obtain this information from Acting Commissioner Oftedal, who stated that Brewer was retained on the pay roll, but not on active duty, only assisting by driving autos. It seems to me that the prohibition administration from chief administrator down have no respect for the Constitution and the Members of Congress. When you violate the Volstead Act you are informed that you are a nullifier. The violation is not a provision of the Constitution, but an act of Congress; on the other hand, to enforce that particular law they disregard all provisions of the Constitution, take the law in their own hands as if they were czars. Why, only the other day, the first time, I believe, in the history of the Civil Service Board, at least for the last 25 years, we find that the Prohibition Commissioner, Dr. J. M. Doran, criticizes the Civil Service Board for the examination given the agents because 85 per cent of them had failed and he requested that a new examination be given.

Doctor Doran does not want to have the agents in the civil-service list, as he and the prohibition administrators will not be able to select gunmen and thugs in order to enforce this law, as Doctor Doran says:

We want men who can raid bootleg joints and uncovered stills, and we don't care whether they can spell difficult words.

Of course, Doctor Doran, like the prohibition administrator of Maryland, wants the type of man as Wimbley, a man who has been convicted of highway robbery, sentenced to a term of six years in the Maryland Penitentiary, and then when he is charged with assault with intent to kill and carrying a deadly weapon, is defended by the United States attorney for the district of Maryland at the expense of the Government, no doubt at the recommendation of the prohibition administrator of the Maryland-District of Columbia area.

I also want to call your attention to the ruling of Judge Gus A. Schuldt, presiding judge of the police court, who, several days ago, dismissed a jury of 1 woman and 11 men because they had dismissed two men charged with the violation of the Volstead Act. According to the ruling, it seems that the trial by jury is also denied, although guaranteed to you by the Constitution, because if the jurors are compelled to believe the agents and disregard entirely the testimony of the accused, or who are compelled to follow the instruction of the judge, then why have a jury trial? It is simply the tendency of men who are under the influence of the Anti-Saloon League that disregard all the constitutional rights of others in order to enforce the Volstead Act.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. PALMISANO. To be frank, no; but——

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman is under oath to protect and defend the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Mr. PALMISANO. I will say this: While I am opposed to the eighteenth amendment from the way I see it violated, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if the gentleman will introduce an amendment striking out the twenty-ninth section of the Volstead Act and provide that every man in Congress and every judge——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three more minutes.

Mr. PALMISANO. If the gentleman from Texas will have the twenty-ninth section of the Volstead Act stricken out and make every judge and every district attorney and every Member of Congress an agent with the right to arrest, and provide that in the event he is found guilty of violating the law by acquiescing in any violation of the act he shall be impeached and for a period of 10 years prevented from holding office under the Federal Government, I will tell the gentleman from Texas now that I will be one of the best agents that the Government will ever have, and will work gratis.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a resolution pending now before the Congress to require all officials of the United States—Cabinet officers, Senators, Congressmen, judges, Army and Navy officers, and Government employees—to obey the law and to support the eighteenth amendment and not buy liquor from a bootlegger. Will the gentleman support that?

Mr. PALMISANO. I just told the gentleman that I would go a little further than even the gentleman from Texas will go. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, although no bill on the subject has as yet been introduced in either House of Congress, Members of both Houses have for some days been receiving telegrams protesting the passage of legislation which is described as "the new corn sugar bill." These telegrams allege that a bill, still unknown to them as to its contents, "would ruin the honey industry, which produces a $2,000,000 crop annually."

There is reason to believe that the telegrams, though purporting to come from all parts of the country, are being prepared in some central agency—an agency that seems to be adequately financed for such purposes.

It would seem that these propagandists at least might have reserved judgment until they knew the contents of the bill. If they had done so their telegrams would not have seemed necessary. I am sure that they would have been deemed unnecessary if the only object of the protestors is to safeguard those who keep bees and those who deal in honey, for their interests will be fully safeguarded in this legislation.

As a matter of fact, honey is now amply protected against the injection or insertion of any foreign material, including sugars, and it is properly so protected, for honey is a product that stands in a class by itself, the purity and integrity of which must be preserved. No legislation in the history of this body has ever been contemplated which would permit the insertion of any of the sugars into any food product sold as honey.

However, these insidious rumors, absurd as they are when analyzed, have been so persistently forced upon Members of Congress that in framing the new bill the proponents of corn sugar legislation have taken them into consideration. They have therefore decided to put into a new bill, although it is legally unnecessary to do so, the following definite and explicit proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be deemed to permit the insertion of dextrose and/or levulose by mixing or blending in any article of food sold or offered for sale as honey.

The framers have made this language as strong as possible and if it can be shown that it is not strong enough they will be glad to make any additions necessary to strengthen it. The proponents of these new sugars have never intended nor contemplated in any way competing with, or interfering with, or hampering in any way, the continuous development of the bee and honey industry.

On the contrary, those who are primarily interested in sugar made from corn are even more vitally interested in bee culture than is the bee industry itself. Without bees the famed Corn Belt must eventually deteriorate in productiveness. To maintain the vitality of corn lands the clovers are a necessary factor, for it is through their cultivation that such lands are replenished as to nitrogen. And the busy little bees are necessary for the propagation of the clover plants. They and they alone carry the pollen that fertilizes these plants.

Instead of ruining or even injuring the bee industry the proponents of this legislation would prefer to add another proviso to the effect that every man who cultivates a field of corn shall be required to keep a colony of bees. That is how much the American farmer, in whose behalf this legislation is proposed, is interested in the associated industry of honeybees.

Instead of seeking to array these two American interests against each other the opponents of the proposed legislation should direct their efforts toward bringing them into cooperation, for these industries are not only necessary to each other but they are both concerned with the production of American sugars for the American people, for honey is the imperial sugar of all sugars, and there is more than ample room for both.

Last year we imported more than 75 per cent of the sugar that we consumed and we consumed over a hundred pounds per capita. There is no reason why we should not derive a larger proportion of this sugar from our own soil crops. We are rejuvenating the cane fields of Louisiana and we are glad of that and we are renewing our efforts in the production of sugar from beets. There will always be a market for all the cane and beet sugar that we can produce in the United States, and with all our efforts we can hardly hope to supply a fifth of that market. Whatever may be said for the new sugars named in this legislation, sucrose derived from cane and beets will largely remain the sugar for household consumption; and even in the industries these new sugars will never displace sucrose to an extent that can effect present American cane or beet sugar production.

There is more than ample room in the American markets for all of these American sugars. All the American sugar industries, including beet, maple, honey, and corn, and the sirup and molasses industries, should cooperate to enlarge the American markets for each and for all.

They will need cooperation, for there will be continued efforts to break down the existing tariff schedules, on sugar and its by-products, of the Fordney-McCumber Act. These tariffs will need defenders, united and determined defenders, against the onslaughts that are possible and probable.

Let us realize that any lowering of the sugar tariffs now or in the near future would ruin all the American sugar industries. Without tariff protection they can not exist.

The necessity for the domestic production of sugars is now recognized by all the great nations of the world. England, with her large colonial production of sucrose, was the last to capitulate. Within two years, by means of a high protective tariff and by subsidies, she has put into home operation 13 large sugar factories, utilizing sugar beets grown on British home soil.

The proponents of the new sugars for which we shall seek legislation invite the cooperation of all the American sugar industries. In union alone is their strength.

Let us beware of the insidious propaganda by which they are seeking to break down our inherent strength by arraying us one against the other.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article on national origins.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, my subject is immigration; more particularly, the much-debated subject of national origins.

On June 7, 1926, Senator SHIPSTEAD introduced in the Senate a bill to repeal the national origins provision of the immigration act of May 26, 1924. On June 15, 1926, I introduced the same bill in the House. The identical bill was reintroduced in this Congress by myself in the House on December 5 and by Senator SHIPSTEAD in the Senate on December 12. This bill, accordingly (S. 1481; H. R. 316), is the first bill introduced in Congress for the repeal of the national origins provision of the immigration act.

I have had in mind discussing at some length this phase of the immigration law and have gathered quite a few data and statistics on the subject. But yesterday I received a copy of a book containing an article on this very subject which is so scientific and exhaustive that I have decided to abandon my contemplated speech and simply insert in the RECORD this most excellent treatise.

The article is printed in the Lutheran World Almanac and Encyclopedia, 1927–28, and is written by Dr. O. M. Norlie, professor at Luther College, Decorah, Iowa. It is the most comprehensive and authoritative document on national origins that has appeared up to this time or is likely to appear in the future.

Doctor Norlie is a scholar of wide renown and one of the most eminent statisticians in the United States to-day. I hope the members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and other Members of the House will take time to study the tables and the facts submitted in this article. They will be found intensely interesting and exceedingly instructive.

[From the Lutheran World Almanac for 1928]

I. NATIONAL ORIGINS

1. EXPLANATION

In 1924 Congress passed an immigration act. Various bills and resolutions were later offered proposing changes, particularly with reference to national origins. The President of the United States appointed the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor to make a scientific study of the matter, and two experts from each of these three departments were appointed to compile national-origin statistics. Hearings were held before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in the House of Representatives on January 18, 19, and 20, 1927, in which the findings of this committee were set forth and explained.

The immigration during the 70-year period 1820–1890 has been called the "old immigration"; that of the period 1890–1920 the "new immigration." The relation between these two periods can be seen from the following table:

Section	Old immigration	Per cent	New immigration	Per cent	Total	Per cent
Western and northern Europe	11,920,220	77.2	4,550,964	24.5	16,471,184	48.9
Eastern and southern Europe	1,782,417	11.6	11,520,409	63.6	13,302,826	39.5
Other lands	1,725,010	11.2	2,147,388	11.9	3,872,398	11.6
Total	15,427,647	100.0	18,218,761	100.0	33,646,408	100.0

This means that the old immigration, often called the "Nordic," formerly called the "Germanic," has decreased from about three-fourths to about one-fourth of the whole immigrant tide. This situation has filled the minds of most American sociologists and statesmen with apprehension. Just as in the days when the fear of an economic and industrial invasion of Chinese led Congress to pass exclusion acts against them, so now Congress has been trying to regulate immigration so as to keep the land open for the Nordics, who were the founders of this land and whose institutions must be maintained.

To illustrate: The present immigration quotas as based on the foreign-born populations in 1890 clearly favor western and northern immigration stock. Thus—

	Quota	Per cent
Western and northern Europe	141,197	85.7
Great Britain	62,574	38.0
England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland	34,007	20.6
Irish Free State	28,567	17.4
Non-British	78,623	47.7
Germany	51,227	31.1
Scandinavia	18,903	11.4
France, Holland, Belgium, etc	8,493	5.2
Eastern and southern Europe	19,925	12.2
Total present quotas, based on 1890 foreign-born population	164,667	100.0

According to the present quotas, listed above, the immigration must now come almost exclusively from western and northern Europe—namely, 85.7 per cent. But only 38 per cent of this 85.7 per cent falls upon Great Britain. Therefore the agitation to readjust the quotas on the basis of national origins. And the new proposal, which was on the brink of becoming a law, is as follows:

	Quota	Per cent
Western and northern Europe	125,531	83.7
Great Britain	93,465	62.3
England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland	85,135	56.7
Irish Free State	8,330	5.6
Non-British	32,066	21.4
Germany	20,028	13.3
Scandinavia	6,170	4.1
France, Holland, Belgium., etc	5,868	4.0
Eastern and southern Europe	23,269	15.5
Other lands	1,200	0.8
Total proposed quotas, based on national-origin estimate of 1924	150,000	100.0

On this proposal the gains and losses over present quotas would be—

	Gain	Loss
	Per cent	Per cent
Western and northern Europe		2.0
Great Britain	24.3
England, Scotland, Wales, and North Ireland	36.2
Irish Free State		11.8
Germany		17.8
Scandinavia		7.3
France, Holland, Belgium, etc		1.2
Eastern and southern Europe	3.3
Other lands		1.3

The facts set forth in this table have been compiled from the "national origins provision, immigration act of 1924, Hearing No. 69.2.1." (1927, p. 5).

The chief country to gain by this proposed immigration act is Protestant Great Britain and the countries to lose are the Irish Free State, Germany, and Scandinavia.

The proposed act seems to be a blow at Germany and Scandinavia in particular.

We question seriously whether the findings of the committee on national origins is scientific. In fact, the report of this committee as submitted to the President of the United States and signed by Secretaries Kellogg, Hoover, and Davis says: "Although this is the best information we have been able to secure, we wish to call attention to the reservation made by the committee and to state that, in our opinion, the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended."

Several things detract from the scientific character of the findings of the committee. For one thing, the population of 1790, as listed in the census reports, is not an adequate basis for the calculation, because it is biased in favor of England and omits most of the other national groups.

Again, the national origins theory rests on the false presumption that all the national groups have the same birth rate and have maintained the same rate from the beginning.

Moreover, this theory must assume that the immigration reports and the census returns have been uniform, complete, and reliable, a very mistaken assumption.

[1] Discrepancy between census and immigration figures.

To show the inadequate and utterly unscientific character of the national origins theory, we present herewith a statistical study of the theory by the method of decades. The United States census has been taken every 10 years, beginning with 1790. The statistics for immigration have been taken every year since 1820 and can be grouped in 10-year periods. The population of the white stock in 1790 was 3,172,444. The total immigration from 1820 to 1920 was 33,646,408, of whom 32,801,857 were whites, a number more than ten times as large as the original population in 1790. The method of decades used in making the following estimate is, in brief, as follows: 1,000,000 for 1 decade is equal to 500,000 for 2 decades and 100,000 for 10 decades; 3,172,444 people in 1790 living 13 decades are equal to 41,241,772 in 1910 living only 1 decade. The figures for immigration are taken from reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration. The statistics of the original population are taken from A Century of Population Growth, published by the Census Bureau in 1909. Assuming that the distribution of population among the various nationalities by the census of 1790 is correct, and assuming that all the national groups have the same rate of natural increase which remains constant, we have added to the native racial stock at each decade the immigrant racial stock for that decade. Taking the white population at a census and adding the 10-year increase through immigration, we have used that total as a devisor in finding out how many times it will go into the total white population of the next census. Then we have used that quotient as a multiplier for each racial group in order to estimate its size at the next census. This was done for each decade from 1790 to 1920. Then in the last four columns of our table we have compared our results for 1920, based upon the national origins theory, with the actual figures of the census report of 1920. The very great discrepancies prove the utter inadequacy of the national origins theory.

III. OBSERVATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

In making the compilation many difficulties arise. For example, the sources are inadequate and conflicting. There does not seem to be much correlation, if any, between the Bureau of the Census and the Bureau of Immigration. The two bureaus do not list the same countries at all times and make changes from decade to decade and from year to year. The Bureau of Immigration keeps a record of races, as, for example, Hebrew and Spanish-American. But it is impossible to say from what countries the Hebrews came or the Spanish-Americans. The Bureau of Immigration lumps the Norwegians, Danes, and Swedes under one heading—Scandinavians—and has separate rubrics for north Italians and south Italians. The Bureau of the Census—not a distinct bureau before 1902—recognized only seven races in 1790, namely, English, Scotch, Irish, Dutch, French, German, and Hebrew, and grouped all the remaining races under one term—all other. Since 1790 the Bureau of the Census has not taken a count of the Hebrews. The 1790 count was made much later on the basis of surnames, and is without question unfair to thousands who had Anglicized their names and thus became counted as English. There is no census of people from Austria-Hungary before 1861, none of Greece before 1881, none of Norway and Sweden as separate countries before 1868, none of Rumania before 1881, none of Turkey before 1881. The census reports do not give the same country all the time. They often omit a country as Poland, but mention a section of another country, as Bohemia. They take no account of the foreign born until 1850. They do not list the children of foreign born until 1890. They take no account of later generations at all. There are discrepancies of fact as well as of method. Thus, on page 83 of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1925 we read that from 1851 to 1860 the number of immigrants was 2,511,060, but on page 85 it is said that 2,598,214 immigrants came over in this period. On page 83 the number for 1861–1870 is 2,377,279; on page 85 it is 2,314,824. The best work of the United States statistical offices is no doubt the best work of its kind in the world, but it is far from perfect. The first law in statistics is to have definite rubrics with definite terminology for each. This law is frequently flaunted.

The national-origins table above was made on the assumption that all the races have multiplied with equal rapidity. This is not the case. The immigrants have multiplied more rapidly than the native population. The poor have had larger families than the rich; country folk larger than city folk. The original stock, according to the census returns, was 82.1 per cent English, and according to the method of decades used in the above table it would number 23,705,229 in 1920, of whom 19,461,993 would be of English stock. The fact is that the native stock is on the decrease, not on the increase. The average family in 1850 had 5.6 members; in 1860, 5.3; in 1870, 5.1; in 1880, 5; in 1890, 4.9; in 1900, 4.7; in 1910, 4.5.

The English are, as a race, the most prominent of the races that make up America. Through early colonization and conquest they laid claim to the whole of the Atlantic seaboard, and later, through war, purchase, and treaty, with the hearty aid of other settlers, extended their possessions from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They determined the language of the country, its form of government, and most of its institutions and opportunities for advancement. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries they were the main contributors to the population of America. During the eighteenth century the Scotch-Irish and the Germans migrated in almost equal numbers, and their combined migration was nearly that of the English for the century. But these newcomers were compelled to settle down as frontiersmen, and to leave to their English-sprung predecessors the more prominent occupations of politics, the professions, education, literature, trade, commerce, army, and navy. From 1820 to 1920 only 2,591,231, or 7.4 per cent of the total immigration, came from England. Still, the English have easily maintained their position as the most influential people in America. They are not handicapped by language or other foreign "taint." They occupy, as a rule, controlling positions in every walk of life. Nearly all the Presidents have been of English lineage; most of the governors. They have furnished most of the editors of the great dailies and the heads of school systems and universities. The great American authors and the captains of industry are nearly all English. The culture of the American schools and the ideals of America as a whole are mainly from England, by way of New England. The English have been, as a rule, kind masters; the other races faithful servants.

It is in the States where the English are most dominant that the decrease in the size of a family is most evident, and in the well-to-do sections of our cities. For example, in New England the average family is only 4.1 persons. The native born in Massachusetts in 1910 had a birth rate of 14.8 per 1,000, but the foreign born had a birth rate of 49.5. The death rate of the natives in Massachusetts was 16.3 for the natives and 15.8 for the foreign born. The deaths were greater than births by 1.5 per 1,000 among the native born; among the foreign born the births were 34 per 1,000 more than the deaths.

Bushee shows in his Ethnic Factors in the Population of Boston (1903) that the birth rate of the native born in Boston is 16.4 per 1,000 and the death rate is 17.2. Of the Irish in Boston the birth rate is 45.6 and the death rate is 25.2; Germans, birth rate 48, and death rate 15; Russian Jews, birth rate 94.6 and death rate 15.9; Italians, birth rate 104.6 and death rate 25.3.

It is generally maintained that the best people limit their offspring; the worst do not. It is said that the worst citizens are most prolific. This depends upon the meaning of good citizenship. A poor man can be a good citizen. He is usually more industrious, thrifty, law abiding and God fearing than the rich, and the statistics prove absolutely that most foreign groups stand above the native population in regard to industry, thrift, obedience to law and practice of religion.

Says Ellwood in his Sociology and Modern Social Problems: "If the present tendencies continue, it is apparently not difficult to foresee a time in the not very distant future when the old Puritan New England families will be replaced in the population of Massachusetts and Boston almost entirely by recent immigrants." Ellwood adds (p. 177): "Practically everywhere the same tendencies are manifest; that is, everywhere we find the native-born white population failing to hold its own alongside of the more recent immigrants. Apparently, therefore, we must conclude that the birth rate of the native whites in the United States is declining to such an extent that that element in our population threatens to become extinct if present tendencies continue." In the light of this situation it is certainly not scientific to reckon that 56.7 per cent of the white stock in the United States hails from Protestant Britain, and to give Protestant Britain a quota of 86,135 out of every 150,000 immigrants.

Therefore, the national origins theory of legislation on immigration is unscientific, unfair, and unwise, and the proposed immigration act ought not to become law. It overlooks important historical facts. It is an unwise discrimination among races and nations. It is based upon an unsound theory of citizenship and an unwarranted fear of the "foreigner." And, above all, it rests upon inadequate statistical calculations.

Up to the close of 1919 the United States had issued five Liberty loans—two in 1917, two in 1918, and one in 1919, the last being known as the Victory Liberty loan. In these five loans $18,500,000,000 was called for. Over $24,000,000,000 was actually subscribed; 21,000,000 people subscribed for the fourth loan. One of the posters in the Victory Liberty loan of April, 1919, was drawn by Howard Chandler Christy, entitled "Americans all!" It had the picture of an American flag, a woman in front of it placing a laurel wreath above the honor roll of men who had given their lives for the United States. There were five names of men from northern and western Europe: Smith, O'Brien, Du Bois, Haucke, and Knutson; there were nine names of men from southern and eastern Europe: Gonzales, Villotto, Andressi, Pappandrikopolous, Chriszanevicz, Kowalski, Turovich, Cejka, and Levy. These were all Americans—"Americans all!". Here were both Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian; all were, as Gavit calls them, "Americans by choice." America had been to them, as Craig puts it, "God's melting pot." The massing here of representatives from many lands should not hinder them from becoming one nation. They all have something to supply and something to surrender for the making of an ideal people. "Stop calling the immigrant a problem," says Shriver. "How would you like somebody to call you a problem?" Among the interesting things in Shriver's book Immigrant Forces is a table showing the proportion of immigrant employees in various industries. For example: Ninety-four per cent of the people engaged in making clothing are immigrants; 53 per cent of those engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes; 71 per cent of the iron and steel workers; 79 per cent of the copper miners; 72 per cent of the coal miners; 89 per cent of the oil refiners; 80 per cent of the furniture makers; 76 per cent of the meat packers; 93 per cent of the sugar refiners.

The variety of races in America is astonishing. America is a Babel. A newspaper reporter observed that in New York City 66 languages are spoken by as many groups, 49 newspapers are published in foreign languages, and the school at Mulberry Bend has children of 29 nationalities. Yet all these eventually become one people, with one language and one flag.

For mankind is one in spirit, and an instinct bears along,
Round earth's electric circle, the swift flash of right or wrong;
Whether conscious or unconscious, yet humanity's vast frame
Through its ocean-sundered fibers feels the gush of joy or shame—
In the gain or loss of one race all the rest have equal claim.

The present writer is American born, from immigrant parents. They had come from Norway, a country small on the map but big in achievement. He went to public school, where he was taunted on account of his nationality and made to believe that his stock was low down and the scum of the earth. He knows better now, for he has carefully investigated his own stock and many other races and written many and authoritative books about them. The following words from the address of President Calvin Coolidge at the Norse-American Centennial, June 8, 1925, St. Paul, Minn., while addressed to the Norwegians in particular, could have been spoken with equal truth about almost any other immigrant group in this land:

"Our America, with all that it represents of hope in the world, is now and will be what you make it. Its institutions of religious liberty, of education and economic opportunity, of constitutional rights, of the integrity of the law, are the most precious possessions of the human race. These do not emanate from the Government. They come from the consecration of the father, the love of the mother, and the devotion of the children. They are the product of that honest, earnest, and tireless effort that goes into the rearing of the family altar and the making of a home of our country. They can have no stronger supporters, no more loyal defenders, than that great body of our citizenship which you represent. When I look upon you and realize what you are and what you have done, I know that in your hands our country is secure. You have laid up your treasure in what America represents, and there will your hearts be also. You have given your pledge to the land of the free. The pledge of the Norwegian people has never yet gone unredeemed." This address has been published by Congress as House Document No. 143, 1926.

A delegation of notables from Norway came to attend the Norse-American Centennial at St. Paul. In New York they were officially welcomed by Mayor John Hylan. In his address, which was very felicitous, he remarked that he liked the Norwegians because they made good servants. "I am glad to hear that," answered the spokesman for the visitors, "they were taught in their Norwegian home to be true and faithful. But bear in mind the promise 'that he who has been faithful over a few things will be made ruler over many things.' The Norwegians, you say, have been faithful in the little things. They are good servants, but they do not remain as servants forever. I understand they are already becoming mayors and hold other offices of honor and trust. Six of your 48 governors are of Norwegian blood."

So it is with the Jew. He may be brought up in the East Side ghetto, but after a while you find him or his sons living on Riverside Drive, West Side. So with the other immigrants, they make good. They came here to make good. They work hard in this beloved land of their choice. They try to transplant the best culture of their fatherlands on American soil. They enrich American ideals and living. They intermarry and produce a vigorous race. They build the home, the most fundamental of social institutions. They do not believe in divorce or race suicide. "The whole history of Europe," says Techet in his Volker, Vaterlander und Fursten (1913), p. 149), "testifies to the wholesome effect of racial intermixture effected under favorable conditions, and it also proves that no race has ever created a progressive civilization without a certain admixture of foreign blood."

The proposed immigration act is not the solution of the immigration problem. It is based on fiction, not fact. It is based on prejudice, not reason. It discriminates against the Germans and Scandinavians, two of the finest groups of immigrants that have ever set foot on American soil and have done more than even the original stock in bearing the brunt and the burden of opening up the frontiers and saving this land as a home of free institutions. The Germans and Scandinavians have been coming to America for a long time, an increasing stream, fresh and powerful as mountain torrents. Leif Erickson, a Norwegian, discovered Vinland in the year 1000; Tyrker, a German, was a member of his band. The Swedes settled Delaware and Pennsylvania in 1638. The Danes and Norwegians were in New York along with Hendrik Hudson. Our America, like England herself, is more German and Scandinavian than English. The proposed immigration act must not pass. It is unfair and pernicious. Let the Germans and Scandinavians come to America and they will enrich this land with brain and brawn, with patriotic devotion, and Christian idealism.

We have no quarrel with Congress for passing laws restricting undesirable immigrants—the criminal, the diseased, the degenerate. Nor do we discuss here the question of restriction at all. We accept the policy of establishing quotas as a political issue, and we are not concerned with the political aspects at all. We call attention to the fact that the proposed quotas on the national origin basis are unscientific and unjust.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I mentioned the fact that I had called on the Bureau of Efficiency for certain information. We have in this bill before us $200,000 for the Bureau of Efficiency. The information I sought was to find out just how they were spending that money, and what their many employees were doing for the Government in return therefor. You will remember that Chief Brown refused to give that information.

When the House met on December 5 last I introduced Resolution No. 16 propounding six questions of inquiry to the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency to bring out this information.

When the Bureau of Efficiency found it was going to be forced to grant it, it did give it. The Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, Mr. Herbert D. Brown, brought to me this morning at my office, in writing, his answer to all such inquiries, giving me all the facts I requested, which I desire to discuss in my 10 minutes. Without reading them I ask unanimous consent to insert them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert the questions and the answers.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the questions and the answers to the questions propounded to him, and I also expect to extend my remarks generally under the leave.

The following are my six questions of inquiry which in my resolution, (H. Res. 16), introduced by me in this House of December 5, 1927, I propounded to said Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency.

Resolved, That the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency is directed to report to the House of Representatives at the earliest date practicable the following facts:

(1) The names, their post-office addresses, and their respective salaries of all officers and employees of the said United States Bureau of Efficiency who have been employed by it during any part of the calendar year of 1927, and when, respectively, they began working for said bureau, and if any have ceased working for said bureau, the date they ceased working for said bureau.

(2) The names and post-office addresses of all persons, corporations, or other business concerns, if any, for whom, since he has been Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, he has rendered any service for which he received pay, when, respectively, he rendered same, and the compensation, respectively, he received for same, if he did do so.

(3) The names of all employees of the United States Bureau of Efficiency since he has been chief of same, if any, who have rendered any service for any person, corporation, or other business concern for which they received pay, the names and addresses of such employees and employers, when they so worked, and the remuneration they received for same, if any did so work.

(4) What departments, bureaus, commissions, or independent establishments of the United States Government has the United States Bureau of Efficiency investigated since January 1, 1927, the number of employees and length of time engaged upon each of same.

(5) What departments or officers of the government of the District of Columbia has the United States Bureau of Efficiency investigated since January 1, 1927, the number of employees and length of time engaged upon each of same, and what law authorized same, respectively.

(6) Where reports of such investigations were made, attach copies.

The following are the six answers said Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, made in writing over his own signature and brought to my office this morning, except that I have left out the argument he made in trying to excuse his accepting employment from corporations on the outside, to wit:

ANSWERS OF HERBERT D. BROWN

On House Resolution 16, I am furnishing you certain information called for by that resolution.

First. I inclose a statement marked "Exhibit A," showing the names, salary rates, dates of appointment, dates of termination of service, if any, of all officers and employees of the Bureau of Efficiency during the period from July 1, 1926, to December 1, 1927. The post-office address of all of the employees of the bureau is Washington, D. C.

Second. I do not consider that the information called for in the second paragraph of the resolution is of any interest to Congress, for the reason that such unofficial undertakings as I have engaged in during the time I have occupied the position of Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency have been conducted outside of the recognized hours for official employment. I am, nevertheless, entirely willing to furnish the information, etc.

The only company from which I have received any considerable amount of money is the du Pont Co. of Wilmington, Del. They have paid me for services covering a period of 13 years—from 1914 to 1927—the sum of $7,886.42. From all other sources I have received about $500.

Third. I am unable to furnish the information called for in the third paragraph of the resolution for the reason that it is not within my knowledge and is not a matter of record. I can state, however, that no officer or employee of the Bureau of Efficiency has rendered any service for any outside concern or individual during the usual hours of duty in Government offices except during periods of leaves of absence.

Fourth. I inclose a list, marked "Exhibit B," of the Government offices, exclusive of the government of the District of Columbia, in which the Bureau of Efficiency was employed during the period from January 1, 1927, to December 1, 1927, showing the amount expended for salaries in connection with each assignment.

Fifth. I inclose a list, marked "Exhibit C," of the offices of the government of the District of Columbia in which the Bureau of Efficiency was engaged during the period from January 1, 1927, to December 1, 1927, showing the aggregate amount expended for salaries in connection with those assignments.

Sixth. I also inclose a memorandum, marked "Exhibit D," relating to the question of the authority for making investigations in the government of the District of Columbia.

Yours very truly,

HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief, Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in these answers the Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, Mr. Herbert D. Brown, shows, and he himself admits, that he has received pay from one outside corporation, the du Ponts of Delaware, $7,886.42 for work he has performed for such corporation since he has been Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. In how long a period?

Mr. BLANTON. Since he has been Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. How long is that?

Mr. BLANTON. He says he has received it during the past 13 years. He became Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency in 1916, and it has been while he was chief.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Is there anything in the law that forbids him to receive it?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield further to my friend; I will let my friend square that with his own conscience.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. It is squared. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman wants to build houses as a contractor, or wants to practice law, during the time that he is in Congress he ought to let the people of Illinois know that he is doing it, and if the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency who is getting $7,500 a year from the people's tax money wants to spend his time on the outside for corporations he ought to let Congress at least know about it without compelling them to dig it out of him. Now, up to finding this out I have been one of his strongest defenders on the floor.

I have not altogether lost confidence in him. I still believe that he is doing some good work. I still would have been his defender here had it not been for his recent actions, but I say that when a man uses his efforts and energies at nighttime for somebody else, he can not do that degree and quality of work which the people are entitled to in the daytime.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret that I have not the time. If I had the time I would. I want to show you why I object to it. This Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency will tell you that he recommends constantly for the departments of this Government, both Federal and District, the purchase of certain important valuable machinery and supplies from various corporations. If you will ask him he will tell you that for the Veterans' Bureau he purchased a tabulating machine which cost the taxpayers of this country over $400,000, and it is stored there in the basement of the Veterans' Bureau, and has never been used by anyone, and there have been four different directors in there since it was purchased, and not one of them has ever used it, because it is not practicable to use it. It is absolutely worthless, so far as four different directors of the Veterans' Bureau have determined.

He will tell you that he helped to draw up the specifications for the purchase of machinery for both the Federal Government and the District government. If you ask him he will tell you that he drew up the specifications for the machinery that made here in the District the last automobile tag numbers, and he will tell you that he not only drew up the specifications, but he afterwards recommended to the District Commissioners that they buy this machinery from the firm from which it was bought. Oh, how easy it is to be employed when a man can draw up specifications for machinery furnished by certain corporations, and when he is in a position to recommend its purchase, for those corporations to come to him and offer him employment that pays him large sums on the outside!

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would not such a contract be void?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because we have Congressmen here like my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPROUL] who believes that so long as they give eight hours a day to the Government they can do anything on earth they want to at night.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Does not the gentleman do that? He is drawing salary from the Government as a Congressman.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I most certainly do not. I have been in Congress 11 years, and I could have made each year since I have been here as much as $20,000 practicing law, but I have never practiced law since I have been a Congressman. I give all my time to the people, and I work day and night for them.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Did not the gentleman lecture in my home city of Chicago and was he not paid for a lecture there?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I did not lecture, but upon invitation I addressed the leading business men of Chicago, and my expenses were paid, and they told me that they got value received for it.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. They told me so also.

Mr. BLANTON. But I do not take employment from them. And I do not take employment from anybody. My time belongs to the people when I am in Congress, and they get all of my time. They do not get a part of it. They get all of my energies; they do not get just part of them.

The Washington Post the other day published an editorial saying that the fact that the head of the Bureau of Efficiency had been employed by the du Ponts, was evidence that he was a great man; that if the du Ponts would employ him and pay him seven or eight thousand dollars it was evidence of his efficiency. When he is drawing specifications and when he is making recommendations for the purchase of valuable machinery, and when he can cause to be purchased for one bureau like the Veterans' Bureau a tabulating machine that cost the taxpayers $400,000 and is worthless, corporations can afford to employ him, and pay him seven or eight thousand dollars in fees. And he says he has received some other fees, amounting to $500 from some others.

Mr. Chairman, I have not altogether lost confidence in Mr. Brown yet. I believe he will quit this practice. When I came here he was one of the most efficient men that we had in the Government. When I came here I had as much confidence in him as I had in any other Government official here in Washington. When I came here I believed that he was doing as much for the taxpayers as any other official in the Government. I have stood here on this floor time and time again when he was attacked and defended him, and I have helped your chairman, MARTIN MADDEN, defend him. I was one of those who helped Mr. MADDEN and Mr. WOOD's committee increase his salary to $7,500 a year. But I was expecting him to give all of his time to the people of this Government and not to accept employment from corporations on the outside. And I expected him to give me information about his bureau when I asked for it. And why did not he give it when I first asked for it? Why did he compel me to force him to give it to me?

Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has about half a minute.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry that I have not more time. I want to call attention to the fact that Mr. Brown admits in the information that he gave me this morning in writing, in response to this Resolution No. 16, that last year for the District government alone, not the Federal Government, he expended $105,000 of the people's money. He did not have any authority of law to do this. He thus wasted the people's tax money, as he has nothing whatever to do with the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] to yield the gentleman a little more time so that he may be able to answer some questions I would like to ask him about that report that is going to be published to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. I would be very glad to answer any questions that the gentleman would ask me if he will get the gentleman from New Hampshire to yield me the time.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will have to get the time from the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN].

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not ask for any more time from the gentleman from New York, as he has already given me more time than he had to spare.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the proceedings this afternoon I concluded that the debate had degenerated or regenerated into a kind of free-for-all tariff fight. Since that time it has regenerated two or three different ways. I am going to talk to you people for a little while, and I believe if you will listen to me I will be able to give you something quite interesting and instructive about negroes and white folks. Most of you gentlemen belong to one or the other of those races, and you ought to be interested.

We southern white folks who know the old-time southern negro, and who like him and appreciate him, consider him a wit and a humorist and a philosopher of a very rare type. There are no others just like him. For instance, a negro went to town one time upon circus day and saw an elephant for the first time. He said, "That is the curiousest animal I ever seed in my life. He eat hay with his tail." Another negro replied, "That ain't no tail; that big thing what hang down over his mouf, you call dat a tail?" The first negro replied, "I dunno what you call it if it ain't a tail. It hang down lak a tail and curl up lak a tail. It sho look lak a tail to me." The other said, "Dat ain't no tail; dat's his trunk." "Den ah reckon dat little un what hang down behin', dats his suitcase," was the reply.

A friend of mine was out with a negro driver some years ago, in the old days of livery teams and buggies, and the negro said to him, "Boss, does you think you has a pretty good time?" "Yes," replied my friend, "I think I have a fine time. I would like for you to show me somebody who has a better time than I." The negro said, "No, Boss; you is mistaken. There ain't nobody in dis world but a nigger dat has a real good time. There are a lot of white folks dat thinks dey has a good time, but it is just ignorance."

I am coming before you to-day to show you in what respect you are in ignorance with reference to certain conditions and to my attitude on certain questions.

I want to make a correction. I have been wanting for three or four years a real chance to discuss an issue before this Congress, and have discussed it three or four times, but having had not more than 5 or 10 minutes on either occasion I could not go into it at all.

Now the question I am going to discuss for a little while is again the Howard University question. I am not going particularly into an argument upon it, but it has been a matter of surprise to me to notice the ignorance that some of my good friends have shown as to my attitude on that question, and my spirit in regard to it. Now, in order that I may correct the ignorance that apparently prevails among some of you folks who have been thinking hard about it and considering me to be a miserable, hard-boiled sinner because of my position on that subject, and in order that I may give it to you straight and candidly and kindly, I have reduced to writing what I am going to say. I am going to read as much of it as the time allotted to me permits, but I want you to get it verbatim et literatim et punctuatim, with no chance of anybody misquoting me or misunderstanding me in the matter.

THE QUESTION OF FEDERAL SUPPORT OF HOWARD UNIVERSITY

For four successive years now I have opposed the items in the Interior bill making appropriations for maintenance and improvement of Howard University. Each year I have been able to eliminate the item from the House bill on point of order that it was an appropriation not authorized by law. The Chairman has always sustained the point of order and the proponents of the measure have always agreed that his ruling was correct.

The items proposed in the bill from year to year have varied in amount from $218,000 to $863,000 and have averaged near a half million dollars a year. It is now 49 years since Congress began appropriating to this institution. The annual amounts to start on were $10,000 per year, and it was more than a quarter of a century before a single appropriation reached $50,000. But as usual in such cases "Increase of appetite grew by what it fed on." It is another case of the camel getting his nose under the tent. The annual amount called for soon grew to more than $100,000, and now for 15 years it has never been less than $100,000. And for seven of those years it has gone above $200,000 and on up as high as $591,000 and then $863,000 for a single year. All told, Congress has given to this one institution for negro education pure gratuities amounting to $5,000,000. I say pure gratuities because Howard is in no sense a Government institution. So, in taking the money of the taxpayer and giving it to this school we have bestowed Federal funds on private charity, just as if we gave the public money to Hampton or Tuskegee or Fiske; or to Yale or Johns Hopkins or George Washington or any other institution for the education of white people.

And all these millions have been thus appropriated without authority of law. It seems to me that we have reached the forks of the road on this matter, and that the road has three forks: (1) We must go on indefinitely making these appropriations illegally, and doubtless indefinitely increasing them; or (2) we must pass a bill to legalize them; or (3) we must quit making them.

I favor the last-mentioned course, but I want to discuss the three briefly.

If we legalize it we commit ourselves permanently to the governmental policy of maintaining at Federal expense a university for one race of our population. We do not maintain such an institution for whites or Indians or any other race except the Negro.

If we go on doing the thing illegally, as in the past, we give the country a bad example of method in legislation, and stultify ourselves as legislators.

But do the conditions demand or justify our continuing these appropriations at all? I hold that in proportion to their educational needs the negroes of America are as well provided for as the white folks. In almost every county of the South the money paid to maintain schools for negro children is far beyond the proportion of tax which the negroes pay. In addition to this every Southern State supports a school of higher grade for negroes, and most of them support two or three such schools. And then there are the private and church schools, institutes, academies, and colleges by the score, and in recent years the Rosenwald schools. In my own State, according to the last report which I have read, there were 47 such schools. At least a half dozen of these are colleges with property, equipment, and support comparing favorably with the average white college of the State. In the Southern States there are more than 200 of them listed as being for "higher education." This, of course, does not mean higher classical education, but in many instances it means higher practical education of the first order.

What I assert unhesitatingly and without fear of contradiction is this: Wherever the Negro race is found, North or South, the State, the county, and private philanthropy are furnishing them elementary schools well proportioned to their numbers and their needs; and also high schools, colleges, and teacher training schools equal to those furnished to the white people, when we consider the numbers in each race that are really prepared for high school and college. Then why should the Federal Government adopt one institution for one race and heap millions in gratuities upon it at the expense of all other institutions of both races? Through municipal and State governments we furnish to white and negro youth schools of all grades from elementary to college, and by cooperation with the States the Federal Government helps both races in agricultural and mechanical schools, but so far as I know Howard is the only real university that receives annually its hundreds of thousands of dollars in gratuities from the Government.

And just across the town there is George Washington University. Of its 6,000 pupils a very large per cent are Government clerks and employees who work hard for the day, then spend their evenings and hard-earned money for some school opportunities. And they pay full twice the rate of tuition that is paid at Howard, which would not be true if their institution received some hundreds of thousands of Government gratuities each year. To you gentlemen who consider me so wicked and hard-boiled on account of my attitude on this matter I commend a slogan: "Millions for negro pupils, not a cent for whites."

My argument is not against Howard University or its work. The plea is made that the Negro race are in need of teachers, preachers, dentists, and physicians, and that Howard is furnishing these. But Howard is not the only institution that can furnish them. Many other schools are doing the same work and doing it without Government appropriation. It is as easy to get voluntary contributions to negro education as to any other line of philanthropy in America. Witness the speedy success of the recent campaign to raise $5,000,000 for Tuskegee and Hampton. Of course, this philanthropy will not turn to Howard in a great way as long as it is understood that the United States Government will provide for that institution. Yet, if your contention as to the work being done by Howard is true, let that plea go to the world with the statement that Government aid has been withdrawn and the response would evidently be even greater than the responses to the appeals of Hampton and Tuskegee.

Howard has come thus far through the munificence of Congress in illegally appropriating to a private institution some $5,000,000 taxed from the people for Government expenses. The time has now come not that the burden should be permanently fastened on the Government in a way to insure its constant growth as a vicious paternalistic proposition, but that the institution should be given the opportunity and responsibility of living and working by its own right and its own strength and in its own way.

But every time this question comes up for consideration in the House it takes a turn against which I want here and now to enter a vigorous protest. In fact, almost every discussion that involves the Negro race in any way takes the same turn. Some of you northern Republicans make it the occasion for saying things which will go out to the negro voters of your districts to impress them that you are their friends and the other fellows are their enemies. This is not only unfair, unjust, and untrue, but it further complicates a social and civic situation which is already serious enough. These insinuations were made when the House discussed the question of a special memorial to the negro troops in France. Again when the question of the bathing beaches for the city of Washington was before us the great and efficient chairman of the Appropriations Committee made a speech which was a startling surprise to me and has become more and more a surprise, as I have observed his sane views and his valuable public service in dealing generally with Federal appropriations. I suppose, however, that we may expect almost any public man to fall occasionally before the temptation of making a speech for home consumption. Yet even in a speech for that purpose the question of justice should be considered.

And even my genial friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] fell before the same false god in his remarks published in last Friday's RECORD, when he appealed especially to his "Democratic friends" and spoke more than once as if this were a party question in which the Democrats were against the negro.

I insist that this should not be, and really is not in any sense either a partisan or a local matter. It is a question of governmental policy and legislative action upon which every man should lay prejudice and political expediency aside and act upon his conscientious judgment as to what is morally right and essentially just. If this is done, I have no fear as to what the final action of the Congress will be.

As to the partisan division on the matter, I may say here that four of the men who have called my position in question have been Democrats, and two of them have been southern Democrats. Again, during the six years that I have been in Washington many of the strongest expressions that I have heard on the negro question have come from northern Republicans. Two men who represent districts extending as far north as the Great Lakes and both of whom hold very high positions in the Republican ranks of this House have expressed to me very strongly their opposition to giving the franchise to citizens of the District of Columbia, and have assigned as their reason the fact that it would enfranchise such a large number of negroes here in the National Capital, and might finally mean negro domination in our capital city. Note, please, this was not the declaration of negro-hating southern Democrats, but of very prominent northern Republican Congressmen. I do not wish to appeal to either sectional prejudice or race prejudice, but when there is a consistent effort to deceive the negro population of America on a question like this I think it is time that the full truth should be told. And just at this point let me say a word to the gentlemen from the north who thus shrink from the idea of having the balance of power in our National Capital held by the Negro race: For my part I am very sure that the most effective agency in bringing that situation about would be to make the city of Washington the great educational and social center for that race. If we are going to give them a great national university, I think it would be wiser to select some other location for it. In my candid opinion, five out of six of the Members of this House are in their naked hearts anxious to avert the possible conditions which I have here mentioned.

But again as to the question of our mental attitudes toward this race of people: During the recent rivers and harbors convention I sat at the banquet table and talked with a prominent delegate from one of the large cities of New York State. He was telling me enthusiastically about the splendid residence suburb in which he lives, and about the rapid growth through which that suburb has recently passed.

Among other advantages which he mentioned, he said with considerable emphasis, "And we do not allow a negro in it." Then he went on to speak of how property values had been brought down and many home owners had suffered crushing loss in so many cities by the settlement of even a few negroes in white communities. Again, a prominent lady from a Northwestern Republican State, speaking to me but recently of the town in which she had lived, said:

> And they do not allow a negro to stay in the town. They have a vigilance committee, whose business it is to meet one when he comes into the town and notify him that he will have to go elsewhere.

Again I call your attention to the things that have occurred in East St. Louis, in Chicago, in Detroit, and elsewhere—in the States of Illinois, Ohio, New Jersey, and so forth. There have been cases of violent race troubles, which at least indicate that the bitterest race antagonisms are not in the South. True, we have in the South the policy of race segregation, more marked, perhaps, than it is in any other country where the two races occupy the same territory. But Lothrop Stoddard in his recent book on Reforging America states that where this segregation is the most rigid and the most marked there occurs the least friction between the races. I am very sure that any change in that particular among our southern people would be very bad for both races and would greatly increase racial antagonism and race troubles generally.

On my recent holiday trip into the South I talked with the president of one of the greatest southern colleges for negroes. He is a white man that was raised and educated in the North and had seen little or nothing of southern conditions until he went there as president of this institution. He stated frankly to me that in his opinion the best friends the negroes have are the southern white folks.

Now let me say again, I do not discuss this rather unpleasant subject through any disposition to arouse prejudices—partisan, racial, or sectional. I really think that northern people and southern people, Republicans and Democrats, are nearer together on these matters than we have perhaps imagined. The race question is here and is, in my opinion, growing more acute in the North than in the South. The proper settlement of it is the white man's burden, and it is a grave responsibility which we should meet bravely and frankly. And it is not fair nor right that it should be handled as a political football.

We southern people have traditional and long-established principles on race relations. For some of these we have been much abused in some places where the race question was not a local reality. It has sometimes been a practical demonstration of the saying that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

I am glad to note, however, that sectional antagonisms on this question are diminishing. As the Negro race has scattered more and more into the various sections of the country and the white people of all sections have come to know him better there has come about a better understanding of his race traits and of the real relations that have so long existed between him and the southern white man. For my part I am sure that the best relation that has ever existed between poverty and wealth, between ignorance and intelligence, and between two widely divergent races has been the relation between the old-time southern negro and his whi' folks. If I had another hour to speak to you, I could fill the time with illustrations of this relationship, and I believe I could show to any doubter that the southern white man with his old-time paternal and somewhat disciplinary care has been the best and the most helpful friend that the Negro race has had.

But this brings me back to the original question of discussion. The southern people and the northern people alike have joined in the move to give the negro something in the way of an education. When we count the tax money which the southern white man has paid for negro schools, I am sure that the southern people have contributed more to this cause than has anybody else. And again I assert that we have given to this race as adequate educational advantages as to any others for whom we provide, and that there is certainly no good reason for, and that there are abundant reasons against, maintaining permanently a great university for negroes in our National Capital at Federal expense. And finally let me say, if this is to be done at all, it ought to be done out of the funds of the District of Columbia, and be a District institution just as in my State, and every other Southern State, we maintain, for instance, a negro agricultural and mechanical college as a State institution. Gentlemen claim that Howard is needed to train physicians and protect the health of the race. If so, let it be done as other District institutions are maintained, the Federal Government furnishing only such proportion of the funds as it furnishes for other District purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague said it ought to be done wholly out of the funds of the District of Columbia. I wonder if he has ever investigated to find out just how many southern States are sending negro students to Howard University at this time. I want to say to my friend that I have investigated it. Many are coming here from many States. Howard University to-day is training nurses for the Negro race; it is training colored dentists; it is training colored doctors, and teachers, and nurses; and it is doing work that must be done for this race which can not help itself. That is the reason I have been liberal. I have never made a point of order against it or any of its appropriations since I have been here, and I never will; because I think it is doing a splendid work for a race of people that must have something done for it if anything is done at all. That is why I have not gone with the gentleman.

Mr. LOWREY. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question: Are there not many other schools that are doing that same thing, and do not the white people and the Indians everywhere need the same thing? The Government is providing for them all alike.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but white people will help white schools more than they will help negro schools; and if it were not for the Government aid that Congress has been giving this institution for the past years it would not be the institution it is; and it would not be doing for the Negro race what it is doing. The gentleman should have said that it is a white man's burden, and it is a burden we must assume. While we have been fudging with the law to do it I have not found it in my heart to make a point of order against these appropriations, and I hope the gentleman will stay here long enough to reach the same conclusion I have reached about it.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to say to my friend from Mississippi that I do not rise in a spirit of citicism at all. My friend knows I appreciate his service here in the House and I appreciate his record as a national leader in the educational field. He knows I know of his service in Mississippi and I know of his service in Texas and other places where he has worked in the department of education. I will say to my friend that, of course, in my talk of last week I had advice for the Democrats. I like the Democrats. I like the negro and sympathize with him and I am with my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in that. I believe we have a great responsibility to the Negro race. The negroes are not in this country of their own free will. They were brought here and it is the white man's burden to foster education among them and send, not only into the District of Columbia, but into the several States of the Union skilled and professional negro leaders, so that they may work amongst the peoples of their own communities. We should prepare here doctors, nurses, educators, and lawyers and send them out to lead the negroes in all parts of the country.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me a question before he answers the two gentlemen who have asked him questions, perhaps he may be able to kill three birds with one barrel. First, let me say to the gentleman that I know of his great interest in the subject of education and of the great work he has done along that line. I believe also that he wishes to be fair to the colored race. Does he not believe that Howard University here at Washington or some other institution like it is necessary in order that the negro may have something like an equal chance with the white man who has all the great universities of America accessible to him? Considering the circumstances of the American negro and all the handicaps he must carry in the struggle for an education, does not the gentleman from Mississippi believe it to be fair and just that there should be one first-class university of high rank where the negro can go and acquire a higher education?

Mr. LOWREY. I do not know where to begin. I guess I will begin here and come through. No; I do not believe that a little bit; because I know that in my State, for instance, there are at least six colleges for negroes, one of them supported by the State and the others supported by Christian denominations. With their equipment and their financial backing they will come nearer furnishing all that is needed for the number of negroes in Mississippi that are ready for college than the number of colleges for white people in Mississippi will come to furnishing it to the number of white people who are ready for college. That is true in my State, and it is true in practically every other Southern State. Then, throughout the North there are not only schools for the negroes, but there are colleges into which they are admitted, the universities for white people. I simply contend that the provision is ample and that it is a bad precedent for the Government to appropriate Government funds by the millions as gratuities to one institution that does not belong to the Government. I do not believe that should be done in order to provide for one race that is being just as well provided for everywhere else. Does that answer your question, so far as you want me to answer it?

Mr. CHALMERS. Of course, I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LOWREY. I do not mean that you agree with me, but have I sufficiently answered your question?

Mr. CHALMERS. I think so.

Mr. LOWREY. Now, what was your question, Mr. BLANTON?

Mr. BLANTON. I will ask the gentleman one. He has not a college in his State that graduates negro dentists, and he has not a college in his State that graduates negro doctors. As far as the gentleman's State is concerned, it graduates negro teachers, and that is as far as it goes, but Howard University graduates negro dentists; it graduates negro physicians and negro surgeons; it graduates negro pharmacists; it graduates negro teachers; and it graduates negro trained nurses. Every one of them is needed from one side of the United States to the other to minister to the colored race, wherever there are members of that race. Now, is the gentleman against that or is he for it? I want to find out where the gentleman stands on it.

Mr. LOWREY. In my observation there are places where negro doctors and negro nurses are needed. I think they are needed here, but if you are going to hang it on that, why not provide a medical or dental college? I have never raised my voice against the Freedmen's Hospital, and never will, and I have never raised my voice against the training of nurses.

I have been to the Spellman Seminary in Atlanta, a school for negro women. I have seen their splendid hospital and their nurse training.

They tell me that their nurses not only nurse their own race, but in many cases white families in the town really prefer them. They think for some reason they make a more desirable helper about the sick room. I am heartily in favor of that, but there is an institution that is graduating nurses just as well as this one. I do not know about Hampton and I do not know about Tuskegee, but I am sure that all of that could be done there. Here is my point, at least. If we drop the Federal appropriation and proclaim to-morrow that this great institution falls entirely upon charity, what will happen? When Tuskegee and Hampton went out to raise money they raised $5,000,000 in a very short while for the two institutions. If the people could have said, "But the Government is giving them $200,000 or $300,000 a year," they could not have touched that amount. They could not have raised a tithe of it.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell my friend about one matter which he can not answer. We will not let negroes go to the State University of Texas. We do not want them there, and for one I am perfectly willing for the Government of the United States to have a university for them in Washington, and to keep them segregated here and away from Texas.

Mr. LOWREY. Yes; I can answer that. There are plenty of negro universities to which your white folks can not go, either. They are supported for the two races. While they can not go to the University of Texas, they can go to other institutions. The University of Texas may be some university. You Texas people think anything is something that is in Texas, but it is not a hopeless and ruinous privation for a negro to be barred from going to the University of Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not the way the doctor used to think when he lived in my State as the head of a Texas institution.

Mr. LOWREY. Oh, I admit Texas is a great, big, windy State, for that matter [laughter], and we will not have any argument on that. You know, the other day there was a dispute here between the gentleman from southern Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] about which place a man ought to go when he has made his fortune and is ready to die—whether he should go to southern Texas to die or ought to go to southern Florida. I said I thought it made very little difference, because if he died in either place it would be the most satisfactory place in the world for him to die. If he died in either place and went to another and happier world, then the change would be so great that it would make it only the more glorious that he had come all the way from Florida or Texas to a place like that, and if he died in either place and went to the wrong place the contrast would be so slight it would not hurt very much. [Laughter.] So I admit that Texas is a great State. I am with the gentleman on that.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Is it not the fact that most of the Southern States support negro educational institutions that have the rank of college or above?

Mr. LOWREY. There is not a Southern State that does not, and there is not a Southern State in which there are less than half a dozen institutions supported within the State by other means that have the rank of a college. The gentleman's State has a great negro university, and there are plenty of places in the North where the negro can go and get his medical education.

But I come back to my first point. If the gentlemen will arrange through proper cooperation with the District of Columbia to educate negro doctors in the District, I will make no fight on that, but this is a question of the maintenance of a great university for all purposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me say to my friend from Mississippi, I do not believe there is a single taxpayer in the State of Texas who will say one word against the little stipend that we give to Howard University every year.

Mr. LOWREY. How many taxpayers are there in the District of Columbia that, when a question of public health is concerned and when the white physicians here do not want the negro practice, would kick against the District maintaining a place to educate its negro doctors and nurses?

Mr. BLANTON. It is more than a District proposition, it is a national proposition. There are negro students there from practically every State in the Union.

Mr. LOWREY. So is Tuskegee a national proposition, and there are students there from almost every State of the Union. So is Hampton and therefore the argument comes that we ought to begin to give some hundred thousand dollars or so to each of those institutions. George Washington University is a national proposition. The lady registrar told me over the phone to-day that they have about 6,000 pupils and their estimate is that two-thirds of them are young men and young women who are working in offices here during the day and taking their hours at night to attend that institution. They pay twice the tuition that is paid at Howard, and it is a national proposition, because there are students there from all over the United States.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. I will yield.

Mr. CHALMERS. I think the crux of the whole matter is this. We approach this subject from different viewpoints. The gentleman from Mississippi would not sit down to the table and eat with a negro.

Mr. LOWREY. I would not.

Mr. CHALMERS. I would and have.

As I said, the negroes are here because we brought them here. The first shipload, I think, was brought over in 1620. Now, the responsibility is the white man's burden. It is up to us it seems to me—and I agree with my friend from Texas that we ought to have in the National Capital a university that would prepare these people especially to go South and lead their fellows in the different avocations and walks of life.

Mr. LOWREY. The trouble is the gentleman has gone far away from the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. We want to find out who brought these negroes here originally.

Mr. CULLEN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LOWREY. Ask the gentleman from Ohio who brought them here.

Mr. CHALMERS. You brought them here. The demand for cheap labor in the South brought them here.

Mr. BLANTON. We are talking about the original ones that came here in 1620. The gentleman is talking about one set of negroes and we are talking about their ancestors.

Mr. LOWREY. Let me say again that I admit what the gentleman says about the white man's burden, that we need doctors and nurses, but I differ from him as wide as the poles on the segregation of races. I am sure the segregation in the South has made the best relations between the races, and that anything else would have brought ruin and bloodshed. There would have been five difficulties between the races where there is now one.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9481 and had come to no resolution thereon.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Interior appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Interior appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, by the passage of H. R. 9136, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which is fair to every department of the Government concerned therein, much needed improvement will go forward in my State. This is especially true in dealing with the Indian population of New Mexico. According to department figures New Mexico has 22,869 Indians, which Indian population is only exceeded by the States of Arizona, Oklahoma, and South Dakota. Moreover, the Indian population in New Mexico is increasing; only two tribes in the State show a decrease, namely, the Jicarilla Apaches, a tribe which numbers only 627; statistics show that there were 11 more deaths than births in that tribe during the past year. The Eastern Navajo Tribe broke even; all other tribes within the State show an increase.

It is stated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs that there are 905 more men than women among the Indians of New Mexico; that this condition results in much wife-stealing among the tribes. In this respect, no doubt, the Indian in his development of modern civilization is to some extent patterning after his white associates. The only defect the department complains about is that there is no law or legislation to remedy this evil among the Indians.

I have suggested for some time that if our Indians are to be recognized as citizens, according to the act of Congress, that the State law be applied to them; if not, that special United States commissioners with proper qualifications should be selected in the locality of the Indian pueblos or settlements; said commissioners to have jurisdiction as to this offense and other offenses, thus bringing our Indian citizens under the jurisdiction of our form of government at the earliest time possible.

It is said by those in charge of the northern Pueblos that the majority of the Indians legally marry and seldom seek divorces. That the Indians of New Mexico as a whole are temperate; that the Indian population as a community consume very little liquor, as compared with white communities of like population. Thus it seems that the civilizing influence and development of the white man has increased his appetite for liquor, whether for medicinal purposes or otherwise. The question of the use of drugs by the New Mexico Indians is very meager; and the use of peyote is said to be restricted within the tribes of the State to one small clan at Taos, N. Mex. The Indians of New Mexico thus far are not yet versed in the making of home-brew liquor, and as to gambling—so often predominant among Indians—that is not found among them.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs states that the individual and tribal property of the New Mexico Indians is valued by the department at $26,391,850, of which more than three million is in livestock and poultry and $240,000 invested in farm wagons, machinery, and automobiles.

The subcommittee investigating the needs of the various Indian schools in New Mexico made the following provisions: For the Albuquerque Indian school, which has an enrollment of 850 pupils, for the support of the school, including salaries, repairs, improvements, heating plant, and the purchase of 20 acres of additional land, a total of $256,500 is appropriated. This school is in a flourishing condition and is said to be one of the most progressive Indian schools of the Southwest.

The Santa Fe Indian school: For the education of Indian children, repairs of school buildings, the construction of a new hospital, will be cared for under the appropriation of $195,000. The committee dealt with the Indian school situation in an exceedingly fair manner, in providing for the uplift of the red man and in helping him to meet the responsibility that soon will come to him.

The Charles Burke Indian School at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., on the Navajo Reservation, having an enrollment of 600 pupils, is provided for in an appropriation of $158,000; this includes the superintendent's pay and general repairs and improvements to the school. The Navajo Tribe is one tribe in the State which has not been given adequate educational facilities. It is said that there are some 500 eligible Navajo children without proper school facilities. The tribe has a great possibility for wealth from its oil, coal, and future agricultural development.

The waters of the Navajo Reservation, moreover, should be protected in the Colorado River in the same manner that the waters of the Gila River were for the Pima Indians of Arizona. The Navajos have a large royalty from oil now accumulating to their credit. The Indian Bureau should request from Congress legislation to set aside each year several hundred thousand dollars from the mineral funds of the tribe, to be used for educational purposes.

The appropriation bill carries an item for $50,000 to carry out a provision of the treaty of June 1, 1868, between the United States and the Navajos. This treaty required that the United States provide school facilities for the children of the Navajo Tribe. The provision was long delayed, nearly 60 years, and it is at last being provided. It is to be hoped that the department will make a speedy survey of the school situation and will recommend in future legislation the setting aside of sufficient income from the great natural resources of oil and coal on Navajo Indian lands for the education of these Indian tribes, so that every Navajo child can be given at least a common-school education.

The Jicarilla and Mescalero Indians are provided for in the bill to the extent of $115,000. These Indians are said to be at this time rather prosperous from the income from lumber and livestock. The Mescaleros number 666. The Indian problem of New Mexico has received very definite and desirable attention from the Indian Bureau, and especially from the painstaking, careful, and hard-working Interior Department branch of the Appropriations Committee, which passed upon the items for the Indian communities of my State.

It is a pleasure to state that the Indian is making material progress in my State; this is especially true of the younger Indians who are being educated and trained in the Indian schools, education thus far largely provided by the Government. It is said that the Navajo boys are especially quick and adept in manual training; they adopt the methods of construction employed by the whites and are changing the unsanitary hogans heretofore used by their parents for modern and, to some extent, sanitary homes. The Navajos are very industrious and quick to follow the labor of the white man. In this respect they show a greater adaptability than do the Pueblo Indians, who have had a civilization dating back a thousand years, and they very reluctantly change to the civilization of their modern white neighbors.

New Mexico has two successful reclamation projects which stand at the peak of success among the irrigation projects fostered by the Government. The Carlsbad project, although handicapped by lack of quick reports from the Reclamation Service, is still struggling for its future utility and is awaiting the fulfillment of the contract by this department of the Government. The figures for 1927 show that the gross value of crop yield in the Carlsbad project is $83 per acre. New Mexico, one of the arid States, has an abundance of water when properly impounded to put the State in the front rank of the successful irrigation States of the Union. The State, however, still remains the runt, if I may use the term, among the irrigation States. This may be due to some extent to the lack of energy of the State to look after its water rights; but a great deal of the situation is due to the old Spanish grants that have been held in large areas and a policy that has prevented small owners from having access to and the use of water by appropriation. This policy many times has been used for political purposes. The native people, due to poverty in water development, have been handicapped.

The Rio Grande project, New Mexico and Texas, is a reclamation project which ranks among the successful projects of the Government; its total value of crop yield for 1926 was $7,760,900. That part of the project lying within the State of Texas was permitted by act of the Sixty-ninth Congress to use $350,000 of the charges to be repaid to the Government for the construction of a canal upon the United States side of the Rio Grande. The canal to be built for the purpose of carrying water to the project in Texas and to prevent the theft of water on the opposite side of the river. The appropriation carried in the bill appears to be generous, in the sum of $430,000, and in further permitting the unexpended balance of $400,000 to be made available in 1928.

These New Mexico projects have returned proper payment to the Government and will continue to do so, as climatic and crop conditions offer a far better return to the Government in New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, and California (by the investment of reclamation funds) than do many of the northern projects fostered by Government aid. Yet, it is with much effort that the Reclamation Bureau can be directed to this outstanding truth. In fact, New Mexico has not been able to have included within her State a new reclamation project since 1906. It is to be hoped that the Reclamation Service as now constituted may scan these remarks and give us the reason for this unjust discrimination.

The Forest Service is moving along very successfully in my State, and in my opinion is functioning very beneficially. The State is fortunate in its large area of national forest land of 8,481,455 acres. It is, in fact, a godsend for the future protection of our State in its water supply. The State is receiving a fund from this timber resource that materially assists in the operation of the State expenses of roads and schools.

The national monuments within the State, seven in number, are receiving recognition by the National Park Service; and the committee having in charge the supervision of the funds for this purpose gave careful and particular attention to the Carlsbad Caverns, a national monument created by proclamation of the President on October 25, 1923. This monument, though known to exist long before the date of its creation as a monument, was first brought to the attention of the President by Dr. Willis T. Lee, of the United States Geological Survey. The National Geographic Society announced the beauties of the caves by publishing pictures of the same. The remarkable decorations excel those of any other caves heretofore known to man. There is one room one-half mile long, with a maximum width of 400 feet and a maximum height of 348 feet; here are nature's wonderful stalactites, varying in sizes and shapes from needlelike formations to huge pendants; even images rivaling the totem poles of the Indians of the far north are found among the stalagmites. The coloring is from a chalky white and frostlike appearance to every color conceivable.

In some places the columns reach from ceiling to floor; basins of onyx marble 50 feet across are found in the big room. Many of the basins are decorated with lily-like pads or crusts of onyx formed at the surface of the pools, resembling the manner in which ice forms at the edge of water pools. Within the caverns are cool springs of pure water for drinking purposes; the water is available in all parts of the cave with the exception of Pera's Chamber, which contains water containing salts not palatable.

The Carlsbad Caverns are 26 miles from Carlsbad, N. Mex.; access to the caves is by an up-to-date automobile road. The hotel facilities and accommodations in this active western town are very good. The cave has been explored 27 miles, of which 7½ miles have trails and are open for travel, carrying the sightseer from the surface to a depth of 800 feet below the surface in the big room.

A committee from the House visited personally all Government activities in New Mexico, and in this appropriation bill dealt very justly with the same. The committee by its action has demonstrated that constructive work should be done in dealing with the Indians, in protecting our national forests, our national parks and monuments, and our reclamation projects. I heartily commend the committee for their fair and careful considerations of the problems committed to their care in my State.

The gentleman now discussing this subject, and who has had personal knowledge of the Carlsbad Caves since 1923, remembers clearly his first efforts upon the floor of the House when he offered an amendment to the then pending Interior Department appropriation bill; the amendment was for $25,000 for the caves. The amendment was defeated. The item, however, was put back in the Senate side, and a good friend on the House side kept the item in the bill. Thus development of the caves was started, and it has advanced wonderfully. This wonderful storehouse of nature's handiwork was visited in 1927 by 30,000 people, as against 11,741 in 1926; 2,453 in 1925; and 1,591 in 1924. The Government has started in earnest to assist in the opening and developing of this picturesque cave created by nature for the study and pleasure of man.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1928

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 17, 1928)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 773) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of the State of Iowa, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

REHABILITATION OF FARM LANDS IN THE FLOOD AREAS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 672) for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas, which will be read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

I will take just a moment to explain the amendments. There are four amendments made by the House of Representatives. The first is on page 1, in lines 3 and 4, to strike out the words "existing in the lower Mississippi Valley as a result of the floods" and to insert in lieu of that language the words "in various States as a result of the floods."

The second strikes out in line 6 the word "area" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "areas."

The third inserts in line 11 the words "continue or," so that it will read "to continue or employ" instead of "to employ."

The fourth is on page 2, line 3, to insert the words "not more than" after the word "appropriated."

In my opinion, the amendments are not material, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 112) opposing the seating of FRANK L. SMITH as a Senator from the State of Illinois, reported from the special committee investigating senatorial campaign expenditures.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we start the discussion, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. There are two resolves in the resolution, paragraph 1 and paragraph 2 of the resolution. I ask as a parliamentary proposition whether the resolution is subject to a division on the vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is subject to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Chair decides that the resolution is subject to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is subject to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. But are the two resolves subject to be voted upon separately?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They can be voted upon separately.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. BAYARD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Finance Committee a communication. with an accompanying resolution, that I have received under date of January 16, 1928, from the Illinois Bankers' Association.

There being no objection, the communication and accompanying paper were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ILLINOIS BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., January 16, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Member the Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Illinois Bankers' Association is much interested in the enactment of H. R. 1 and especially in the provision pertaining to the corporation income tax. I take the liberty of inclosing a copy of resolutions on this subject adopted by our committee on Federal legislation, which have been approved by our executive council.

We believe that corporations are entitled to a reduction in the corporation income tax to a rate not to exceed 10 per cent; that such a reduction will help to aid industry and prevent a possible business depression; that individuals doing business as such now have a distinct advantage over corporations because of unequal Federal taxation, and that the present rate is unfair to corporations.

We respectfully urge that H. R. 1 be given immediate consideration and legislation granting the desired relief enacted as early as possible. Delay would not only prevent the reduction in the tax that corporations as a whole seem entitled to, but would continue the present inequity for another year.

Your efforts along this line will be very much appreciated by the bankers of Illinois.

Yours very truly,

M. A. GRAETTINGER, Secretary.

The committee believes that corporations were discriminated against when the Federal income law was last amended; that the relief to corporate business previously expected and not granted should now be forthcoming; that the present Federal tax of 13½ per cent on every dollar of net earnings by corporations is oppressive and unjust; that the tremendous surplus accumulating annually in the United States Treasury warrants a reduction and that such reduction should be no less than 3½ points, leaving a net corporate tax of 10 per cent.

To the end that the law may be amended to bring the desired and deserved relief to corporations, this committee will use its best efforts to arouse the interest of, and secure the promise of support from, the Senators and Congressmen of this State.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Evangelical Mission Church, of New Gottland, Kans., protesting against the quota provision of the existing immigration law and favoring the amendment of that law so that the new quota provision be repealed and the provision of previous law continued, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BINGHAM presented a resolution adopted by the Swedish Evangelical Mission Church, of Woodstock, Conn., protesting against the quota provision of the existing immigration law and favoring amendment of that law so that the new quota provision be repealed and the provision of previous law continued, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

RESTRICTIONS OF LOANS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 113), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Whereas the total loans secured by stocks and bonds of the 51 member banks in the New York Federal reserve district on January 11, 1928, reached the unprecedented total of $3,819,573,000; and

Whereas the largest part of this sum is used for speculation on the New York Stock Exchange, as stated by the Federal Reserve Board in its annual report for 1926, as follows:

"The largest growth, both absolutely and relatively, was in security loans, which increased by about 66 per cent during the period. That this growth in loans on securities represents to a considerable extent an increased volume of credit used in financing transactions in securities at the New York Stock Exchange is indicated by the rapid growth during the period of loans to brokers and dealers in securities in the New York market"; and

Whereas during the past year such speculative loans made through the Federal reserve system have increased more than a billion dollars, and during the past seven years more than $3,000,000,000; and

Whereas the reports of the New York Federal Reserve Bank reveal that $1,502,580,000 of these loans on stocks and bonds is for the account of out-of-town banks, representing credit transferred from other parts of the country, to be used in New York for speculative purposes; and

Whereas the inevitable result of the utilization of the funds of the Federal reserve system for speculative purposes is to restrict the amount of credit available for legitimate commercial purposes, as is indicated by the fact that the amount of commercial paper outstanding as reported to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York actually decreased from a total of $925,379,000 in October, 1924, to $610,945,000 in October, 1927; and

Whereas the intent of the Congress in the creation of the Federal reserve system was to prevent its use for the encouragement or support of purely speculative operations, as is evidenced by the following paragraph of section 13 of the Federal reserve act:

"Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for such purposes, the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount within the meaning of this act. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, secured by staple agricultural products, or other goods, wares, or merchandise from being eligible for such discount, and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors issued as such making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount; but such definition shall not include notes, drafts, or bills covering merely investments or issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, or other investment securities, except bonds and notes of the Government of the United States": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Federal Reserve Board should immediately take steps to restrict the further expansion of loans by member banks for speculative purposes and as rapidly as is compatible with the financial stability of the Nation require the contraction of such loans to the lowest possible amount; and be it further

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to report to the Congress what legislation, if any, is required to prevent the future use of the funds and credit of the Federal reserve system for speculative purposes.

CONFERENCE FOR THE LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I present the records of the Conference for the Limitation of Naval Armament, held at Geneva from June 20 to August 4, 1927, which I move be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHMOND P. HOBSON ON THE PERIL OF NARCOTIC DRUGS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I present an article prepared by Hon. Richmond P. Hobson, director of the Anti-Narcotic League, on the peril of narcotic drugs, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO DISTINCT NARCOTIC PROBLEMS

There are two distinct narcotic problems that menace the world. The old opium problem proper, that affects chiefly the eastern peoples; the new heroin problem, that now menaces the western nations. Heretofore the old problem, naturally, has held the center of the stage, and the new problem has scarcely yet come in for recognition, though it menaces the western world more than the old problem the eastern world. The opium problem grows slowly. The heroin problem is spreading with inconceivable swiftness, and it is of the utmost importance that it should engage the attention of western nations with the least possible delay.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF BOTH PROBLEMS

It is hard to realize how serious these problems really are—the opium problem to the eastern world, the heroin problem to the western world. Addicts in the Orient are numbered literally as tens of millions.

In the western world the ravages of heroin addiction are fast getting beyond control.

The health commissioner of a great city of the Middle West, investigating the cause of the rising tide of crime, reported that girls and boys are appearing in the underworld by the thousands at very tender ages—14, 15, 16, 17—practically all of the girls and most of the boys having come by the swift drug road.

Scientific men, in view of the hopelessness of permanent cures, call drug addicts "the living dead."

PHILOSOPHY-HISTORY

The human race is consuming every year many thousands of tons of poisonous narcotic drugs, not 1 per cent of which is necessary for strictly medicinal purposes. Nearly all of this great quantity is consumed by addicts who number in the world scores of millions—who are abject slaves—who consider getting their drug supply as the supreme consideration, in many cases as a matter of life and death.

The production and distribution of these drugs constitute a profitable traffic of vast proportions extending to all corners of the earth. In the Orient, the chief home of the sleep poppy whose seed capsules produce opium, the governments, for the revenue profits, encourage and often subsidize production and control distribution. In the Occident, where chemical science is turned to concentrating the poison of opium into morphine and turning this into a still more powerful poison narcotic (heroin), laws and regulations loosely enacted for repression drive most of the addiction traffic to cover, where it flourishes in the dark in spite of the agents of the law.

The motive and urge that constantly drive the traffic on are the enormous profits, the jobber and retailer between them often realizing more than a thousand per cent profit. Add to this the lure for the armies of impoverished addicts of getting the drug for themselves through recruiting and supplying new addicts. It is not surprising that the amount of narcotic drugs produced is probably thirty times the amount required for medicinal purposes.

Human slavery as a source of profit dates back to remote ages and continued far into the Christian era, almost to the present time—even amongst advanced peoples. The bondage of narcotic drugs is a modified form of the exploitation of slavery. While this form of exploitation of human beings through bondage is of less than two centuries growth, it has reached proportions both in the number of bondmen and in the profits of the traffic, far greater than those of the slave traffic at its maximum. The source of supply of the new drug, "heroin," the most menacing narcotic drug yet produced, has heretofore been opium and morphine, but because of the enormous profits in the exploitation of this drug, due to its power of enslaving the youthful victims, the new banditry made possible, and the recruiting activities of its victims, through a veritable mania, we may expect synthetic chemists to develop new sources of supply, in all probability starting from coal-tar products. Furthermore, in course of time for the same reasons we may expect as synthetic chemistry progresses the bringing forth of new narcotic drugs even more powerful and deadly than heroin.

The profits are so great because the poor addict, under the awful depression and torture of withdrawal symptoms, feels he must have the drug, no matter what the cost or the consequences, whether he has to spend his last dollar, whether he has to steal to get the money, whether he has to rob or even commit murder.

The bulk of this vast horde are "hooked" into addiction because of their ignorance, never dreaming what the consequences are to be when they take the first "shot" or first "sniff."

IGNORANCE—THE REAL CAUSE

Manifestly, no normal youth, or, for that matter, normal adult, would deliberately embrace this "living death" of drug addiction if he knew what it meant. The whole recruiting system is based on the ignorance of the victims, and thorough education would literally sweep away the very foundation of this hideous traffic.

"Tuffy Reid," a youth of 20, of Los Angeles, Calif., was hanged recently at St. Quentin, the California penitentiary, for murder committed while robbing a store.

Just before the execution he gave a statement that ended with these words:

"I never committed a crime until after I was 'hooked' at the age of 16. A peddler offered me a pinch of 'snow,' saying it was 'great stuff' and would give me a kick. When I held back he said, 'Oh, be a sport; try anything once.' I did. But it was once too often. I never dreamed what it would lead to. Oh, if somebody had only warned me.

"There are so many ways in which they are 'hooking' the boys and girls. Why, in heaven's name, doesn't somebody warn them?"

Society is made up of individuals and has the same motives of self-preservation as the individual, and it is only in its ignorance that it could be subjected to ruthless exploitation of drugs. Therefore, the fundamental principle of grand strategy of the struggle is simple. The forces of education that may be termed the "life forces" must find the way to get the vital knowledge of drug addiction to society, and especially to the youth, while the forces of exploitation, which may be termed the "death forces," for their own existence must thwart these efforts and throw all obstacles in the path.

MAJOR TACTICS

Remembering this fundamental principle, it is not difficult to recognize the plays inaugurated by the enemy. The following are some of them:

(1) The agents and the friends of the traffic to pretend to be opposed to education on the ground of the danger of arousing curiosity and getting better results from suggestion. As a matter of fact, educators exploded this fallacy in general long ago. Curiosity and the impulse to try anything once are aroused by the peddlers when the victim is ignorant, whereas loathing is aroused when he is informed. It is manifest that with such awful consequences falling upon addicts this, of all questions, lends itself the most effectively to the processes of education.

(2) Agents and friends of the traffic would be opposed to popular articles with fear that exaggerations may slip in. As a matter of fact, with so much secretiveness, when new facts are brought out it can be assumed that "the half has never been told."

(3) Agents and friends of the traffic keep the heroin problem in the background by keeping the eyes of the western world turned upon the opium problem of the East and away from the heroin problems of the West.

(4) Agents and friends of the traffic express surprise and doubt the discovery and production of synthetic heroin, with the inference that opium is still necessary to its production and in treating addiction problems of the West, as though it were simply the comparatively slight problem of morphine addiction and one of therapeutics, to be dealt with and controlled by the medical profession, and to ignore or minimize the great and overshadowing problem of criminal heroin addiction.

(5) Agents and friends of the traffic pose as infallible in their own unscientific conclusions, and criticize without scruples the conclusions of those promoting education, no matter how scientifically arrived at.

(6) Agents and friends of the traffic oppose secretly all important moves of those promoting narcotic education and spread under cover false rumors concerning the affairs of education organizations.

(7) Not infrequently the instruments for such unscrupulous methods are addicts themselves, with naturally very little regard for veracity and honor, whose psychology can usually be protected by its apologetic attitude toward addicts and its tendency to belittle the problem of addiction. It is not necessary to pursue these tactical items further. Speaking generally, while there may be exceptional cases, it can be said that active opposition to reasonable efforts for narcotic education is indefensible.

The sleep poppy, the source of opium, is a native plant in Asia and southeastern Europe. Frequent notices of its use for poisoning are found in ancient and medieval records. Opium smoking was devised by the Dutch in Java in the eighteenth century, first mixed with tobacco, then used alone. From Java it was taken to Formosa, and thence to the mainland of China.

Portuguese traders first developed the importation of opium into China.

They were succeeded by the East India Co. with a monopoly of the traffic of India. The amount shipped from India into China rose as high as 10,000,000 pounds in the year 1858. In 1906 the production in China itself was estimated at 44,000,000 pounds, importations from India that year being over 7,000,000 pounds. At that date estimates place the number of addicts in China at 27 per cent of the adult male population.

In 1803 a French chemist discovered how to produce morphine from opium, and a half century later an American chemist discovered how to produce cocaine from coca leaves.

These concentrated drugs used generally in medicine, ten times as powerful as opium, swiftly produced addiction in all lands, at first as a by-product of medical practice, later through exploitation as well.

In 1898 a German chemist discovered how to produce heroin from morphine, between three and four times as powerful as morphine. With the spread of heroin, the narcotic menace has developed into a pressing world peril.

In 1729 the Chinese Government issued an edict prohibiting opium smoking in China. The effect was good but proved of little permanent avail. In 1790 the Chinese Government again issued an edict prohibiting opium smoking and in 1800 prohibiting the importation of opium into China. This led up to the opium wars waged on China which compelled its submission to the importation of the opium.

The dawning of hope for real reform came when America in 1905 enacted a law prohibiting opium traffic in the Philippine Islands and sent a committee to the governments of the Orient. This action was followed by China in 1906 with an edict prohibiting the use of opium and the culture of the poppy. Upon the initiative of the United States, the first international opium conference was held in Shanghai in 1909, followed by a second and third conference at The Hague in 1912 and 1913. Recently conferences of the opium commission of the League of Nations and its committees have been held at Geneva.

These conferences while of great value, particularly in bringing out the fact that narcotic drug addiction is a problem to all nations and to the human race, have illustrated how slow and how difficult it is to secure adequate international cooperation and how even where these have been secured, though of elementary nature, the greatest difficulties have been encountered on account of smuggling. Universal experience has shown that laws and treaties are difficult to secure and more difficult to enforce.

The Shanghai conference in 1900, The Hague convention of 1912 and 1913, and the meetings of the opium commission of the League of Nations, successor of The Hague conventions, have been confined with limited agenda, to processes of law, while the Philadelphia world conference of 1926, called by the International Narcotic Education Association, was restricted to questions of narcotic education. The conference of committees in New York in 1927, on the other hand, grappled with the whole problem of narcotic defense and founded the World Narcotic Defense Association to be a center of control to promote the defense, relief, safety, and immunity of mankind from this universal menace.

WORLD NARCOTIC DEFENSE ASSOCIATION

The desire for financial profits, springing from the basic and universal motive of self-preservation, tends to bring forth antisocial business activities on the part of individuals and groups to exploit society through harmful commodities, especially those that are habit forming and enslaving, which, naturally, prove the most profitable.

Since the universal motive of self-preservation raises a barrier of protection where knowledge and appreciation of the consequences exist, the exploitation thrives upon the ignorance of its victims before their capture and their helplessness afterwards. Therefore, education, revealing the nature and consequences, is fundamental in any comprehensive treatment.

This exploitation partakes of the nature of a parasite and the nature of a beast of prey or inherent enemy. Therefore, governmental and legal processes are logical weapons for society to invoke and organize for its defense.

Since its victims are the chief instruments through which this enemy preys upon society, the isolation and rehabilitation of these victims, constitute an integral part of the treatment.

The defense of society against narcotic-drug addiction must therefore embrace processes of education, processes of law, and processes of reclamation.

The following is the resolution adopted at the conference of committees:

"Resolved, That the governing board of the conference be authorized and requested to provide for the incorporation under the laws of the State of New York of an association, nonprofit, wholly eleemosynary, to be known as the World Narcotic Defense Association, with full powers to utilize all honorable means to attain the following object, namely, the mobilization and direction of the resources and vitality of society everywhere against narcotic-drug addiction to acquire and maintain immunity from this universal racial menace.

"Resolved further, That the World Narcotic Defense Association should have authority to raise, establish, and administer the narcotic-drug defense foundation and other funds for developing existing agencies and creating and developing new agencies of narcotic defense, including processes of education, processes of law, processes of reclamation, and such other agencies and processes as the association may deem necessary or expedient to combat the ravages of narcotic-drug addiction in America and throughout the world."

In pursuance of this resolution the association has been duly incorporated under the laws of New York, with the members of the governing board as incorporators.

This association is designed to be a central control to stimulate, organize, direct, and correlate narcotic-defense activities everywhere in all departments so that processes of education, processes of law, and processes of reclamation will act and react until the vital forces of organized society are marshaled to throw off this menacing ill.

The main reliance in America, as in other lands, for permanent relief from this threatening ill must be found, as intimated before, in the process of prevention through organized narcotic education. Experimentation during the last seven years has brought out the methods by which this can be effectuated. The principle involved is that of having an analogy of a nerve center or ganglion of the body physical which presides over the question of safety from this peril and organizes and stimulates and directs the vital forces of society to make effective resistance. For carrying out this principle two organizations have been developed by a process of actual functioning, namely: The International Narcotic Education Association, incorporated in 1921 under the laws of California, a corporation "not for profit," which undertakes to organize, develop, and standardize narcotic education in the schools, colleges, and education machinery proper of this country proper and ultimately of other countries, and the World Conference on Narcotic Education, its subsidiary, founded in Philadelphia July 8, 1926, which seeks the cooperation of organized agencies, the press, the pulpit, the screen, the radio, clubs, associations, etc., to extend narcotic education throughout society in general, and especially during narcotic education week, the last week of February of each year.

NARCOTIC EDUCATION WEEK

The following is an extract from the report of the first annual observance of Narcotic Education Week, February, 1927:

"The phenomenal success of the first annual observance of narcotic education week, the last week in February, 1927, in the enthusiastic adherence throughout this country, as well as in many foreign lands, and the quickened interest which was manifest in all departments, fully justifies making Narcotic Education Week a permanent institution and further demonstrates the fact that in education we are on the true road.

"Special satisfaction is felt from the effect of public opinion created during Narcotic Education Week upon the legislatures of the several States in session at that time. Many legislatures heretofore indifferent promptly took up and enacted progressive narcotic legislation. Especially gratifying has been the Legislatures of California and New York. For many years these legislatures had regularly defeated narcotic bills. After narcotic education week and during the congested periods that precede adjournment these legislatures, without serious opposition, passed progressive laws that would have been considered impossible of passage before.

"Evidencing the splendid indorsement of Narcotic Education Week, out of 3,400 replies to a preliminary query addressed to a group of individuals comprising the leaders of thought in various fields, designed for the purpose of appraising public sentiment, 3,369 were favorable and 31 unfavorable—opposition amounting to less than one-tenth of 1 per cent.

"Using the spoken word, records show that more than 21,000 organized programs were conducted by civic and religious organizations, nearly 10,000 by woman's organizations, about 5,000 by colleges, schools, and teachers' associations. Nearly 400 broadcasting stations put a narcotic education message on the air, and 76 of these put on a well-prepared drama.

"The written word was as widely invoked. Clippings from all parts of the country show the general cooperation of the press, through the Associated Press, the United Press, Universal Service, and other agencies. The service included editorials, pictorials, news items, general, national, local, feature articles, etc. The local press gave important assistance, especially in helping groups in putting on their programs. Major organizations, institutions, business groups freely used their own trade journals, periodicals, bulletins, etc.

"The far-reaching benefit of so vast an educational impact through both the spoken word and the written word can scarcely be overestimated. Narcotic Education Week ought truly to serve as a continuing stimulus to more energetic effort throughout the future."

TOXICOLOGY—BIOLOGY

The principal narcotics that have defied legal control and are now scourging humanity, namely, opium, morphine, cocaine, heroin, belong to the general class of organic or hydrocarbon poisons. They concentrate their attack upon the nervous system, producing in toxic doses, delirium, coma, convulsions.

These are all alkaloidal poisons, most of which in nature are generated by plants.

Opium is the coagulated sap of the capsules of the sleep or white poppy, grown chiefly in India, China, Turkey, and Persia. Morphine constitutes the principal poisoning element in opium, about 8 to 15 per cent. Heroin was made formerly only from morphine by treating it with acetic acid and hydrochloric acid. It is reported now, as stated, that chemists have learned how to make it synthetically from coal-tar products. Cocaine is made usually from the leaves of the coca plant grown chiefly in South America, but is now made also synthetically from coal-tar products.

Chemically, these poisons are built up around the deadly pyridin base containing five atoms of hydrogen, five atoms of carbon, and one atom of nitrogen, joined together in a nucleus like a closed ring. The complex structure in this opium group contains three rings, the phenanthren structure united to the nitrogen nucleus, with oxygen introduced.

In morphine, the formula, $C_{17}H_{19}O_3N$, contains 17 atoms of carbon, 19 of hydrogen, and 1 of nitrogen, 3 of oxygen. The formula of cocaine is $C_{17}H_{21}O_4N$. In the case of heroin, acetic and hydrochloric acid introduce additional complexity, giving more powerful poisoning properties, producing morphine-diacetylate, having the formula $C_{21}H_{23}O_5N$.

Protoplasm, the living material from which all living parts are built, is composed of proteins, water and a little salt. Its life processes require a regular supply of food and oxygen and regular elimination of waste products. Some poisons attack the protoplasm itself; some interfere with its necessary life processes; some do both.

The highly organized alkaloidal poisons combine readily with proteins, and easily penetrate the wall or sheathing that protects the living cells. Consequently, we would expect the result to be not only violent derangement in the usual activities and life processes but permanent injury to the structure.

Since the nervous system is the most highly organized part of the whole human organism, it is not surprising that these complex alkaloidal poisons should show their chief effect upon the nervous system and should attack man more than the lower animals. Since, of the nervous system, the upper brain is the most delicate, it is not surprising that this part should be quickly attacked and deeply injured, although it is from damage to the functions of the lower brain that death occurs with a fatal dose.

PHYSIOLOGY

Narcotics are soluble in fat, so they penetrate the fatty sheathing that protects the brain from most harmful substances in the blood current, and in this way the poison comes quickly in contact with the delicate, highly organized gray matter.

One of the earlier physiological effects is to stop the action of the parts that cause the sensation of pain, and this is what gives narcotics their chief legitimate value in the practice of medicine, but even in the effect of deadening the sense of pain the action of the drug is that of a poison. The medicinal is contracting.

In the same way these poisons attack the delicate, carefully protected organs of reproduction, impairing the sexual powers of the male, causing the female addict to become sterile, and undermining the germ plasm, by virtue of which the species renews its life from generation to generation.

Tyrode (Harvard), in his Pharmacology, sums up the symptoms of morphine addition as follows: "Depravity of the mind; general debility; loss of weight and appetite; loss of sexual powers; sleeplessness; eczema; contracted pupils; diarrhea, alternating with constipation; and finally death from malnutrition."

The case is different with cocaine and heroin. The victims of these powerful drugs, unless they have repeated treatment, live but a short time, at best. The degeneration of the upper brain is so swift that the elements of character crumble in a few months. Complete demoralization follows and often the life of crime joins with physical ills and the spur of torture of the drug to hasten the end.

One-eighth of a grain of morphine or one twenty-fifth of a grain of heroin is sufficient to cause the drug effect. In a few days the system will develop sufficient capacity to neutralize this quantity. Then the drug effect will be felt only after getting beyond the point of neutralization, when it will be necessary to have a quarter of a grain, later a half grain, and soon a grain and more to produce the desired effect. Though 1 to 2 grains of morphine is a fatal dose ordinarily to a person unaccustomed to the drug, 10 grains of morphine daily is common, many taking 20 grains, some 50. There are records of more than 100 grains taken daily.

When the drug begins to subside, as it does in a few hours, the equilibrium is upset as though by an irritating poison. The distressing effect is general, no part of the body escapes. A condition of torture sets in. The muscles seem to become knotty. Cramps ensue in the abdomen and viscera, attended frequently by vomiting and involuntary discharge of the bowels. Pains often succeed each other as though a sword were being thrust through the body. In advanced cases this suffering (called withdrawal symptoms) is considered the most acute torture ever endured by man and continues for days. In some cases death will ensue if the addict is far advanced and the dose or "shots" are suddenly stopped. The drug of addiction will quickly relieve this torture. Naturally the addict comes to consider getting his supply of the drug as a matter of life and death.

PSYCHOLOGY

Morphine, cocaine, heroin are white powders, all soluble in water, all bitter to the taste. Morphine is usually put up in the form of tablets. Cocaine and heroin are called "snow," and in various localities by other names.

Heroin predominates now, especially in the eastern portion of the United States, so that "snow," "snow parties," etc., refer usually to heroin.

When luring girls into addiction the peddler often calls heroin "headache powder." With peddlers at large, using as they often do boys and girls to aid them, the safe precaution for a youth of either sex to take is to repulse instantly any suggestion to "take a shot," which means to take a hypodermic of morphine, to take "a sniff" or "a blow" of "snow," and to avoid all forms of white powder.

It is the custom to give away heroin free to the youth till he or she is "hooked." When children are away from home it is a safe practice to accept nothing as a gift to eat, drink, or whiff, not even from a supposed friend. When you decline the first offer, the boy or girl aiding the peddler will taunt you or challenge you and say, "Try anything once," "You will get a kick out of it," "Watch me," "Come to our 'snow party' and watch the other fellows do it." Alas! Once is once too often. The poison is so swift that the poor youth will seek the next party for relief, and the next. A "snow party" a day for a week will probably drag a youth into the bondage of addiction worse than death from which experience teaches there is no sure escape.

The narcotic poison penetrating the upper brain naturally inflicts the deepest and swiftest injury upon the parts that are the tenderest, the most complex, and unstable, which are developed latest in human evolutionary progress and distinguish the man from the brute. This part of the brain may be considered as the temple of the spirit, the seat of altruistic motives, of character, of those high, God-like traits upon which an advanced and enduring civilization are built.

The transformation in character is swift in the young, and swifter with cocaine and heroin than with the other narcotics. In an incredibly short time a youth of either sex "hooked" with the "snow gang" loses the results of good heredity and of careful home training.

Self-respect, honor, obedience, ambition, truthfulness melt away. Virtue and morality disintegrate. The question of securing the drug supply becomes absolutely dominant. To get this supply the addict will not only advocate public policies against the public welfare but will lie, steal, rob, and if necessary commit murder. Thus we can understand how intimately addiction is connected causatively with crime.

In addition to the general antisocial traits of all addicts the heroin addict has two special characteristics: First, for a period after taking the drug he experiences an "exaltation of the ego," looks upon himself as a hero. Bent upon getting money to buy his drug, he will dare anything, thinks he can accomplish anything. The daylight holdups, robberies, and murders committed by these young criminal heroin addicts eclipse in daring all the exploits of Jesse James and his gang. This can be said also of cocaine addicts.

Secondly, the heroin addict has a mania to bring everybody else into addiction. It may be said in general that all addicts have a desire for company and wish others to share with them the problem of securing the drug supply, but in the case of the heroin addict, it is an absolute mania for recruiting. He thinks, dreams, plots to bring all whom he contacts into addiction. All addiction tends to spread. Heroin addiction can be likened to a contagion.

Dr. Alexander Lambert, in a hearing before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Sixty-seventh Congress, said: "Cocaine brings an insanity, an acute insanity with it, but cocaine and heroin both inflate personality. Heroin cuts off the sense of responsibility in the moral sense much quicker than morphine. The heroin addicts will more quickly commit crime, with no sense of regret or responsibility for it. The herd instinct is obliterated by heroin, and the herd instincts are the ones which control the moral sense in the sense of responsibility to others. Heroin is the worst evil of them all."

Another general characteristic of addiction psychology is secretiveness. Where the drug supply is easily accessible so that withdrawal symptoms do not occur, addicts sometimes remain for months or years undetected by their own families and most intimate friends.

SOCIOLOGY

The family is the foundation of society. In the family, society not only prepares its citizenship in the most essential attributes of character, but renews its very life through the welding of two lines of germ plasm. Without considering the economics of the home and the want and tragedy that come in with narcotics, we must look upon narcotics as making a deadly assault upon the germ plasm itself. In the earlier stages addiction weakens the germ plasm and tends toward the production of abnormal offspring.

In the later stages of addiction, the male addict loses sexual power and the female addict becomes sterile, thus the line of germ plasm ends.

It is usually morhpine given in illness by a careless physician or taken in patent medicines that brings addiction, with its train of sorrows, to parents in established homes. However, these make but a small percentage of the new addicts. Heroin, on the other hand, usually catches the boy and the girl between 16 and 20, or even younger, like the young bird before it has learned to fly, and the new homes are never built. These victims constitute the bulk of new recruits that are swelling the ranks of addiction.

The average standard of character of the citizen determines the stage of civilization. The spread of morphine addiction tends to bring social disorders and gradual decay. The spread of heroin besides lowering the standard of citizenship of necessity hastens social death by stopping the reproduction of homes.

It is with the Nation as with the individuals and the families that compose the Nation. The unchecked advance of addiction must entail national degradation, ending in national death.

In scientific circles, because of their ghastly plight and almost hopeless outlook for permanent relief, addicts are called the "living dead." The spread of addiction in any land must be regarded as the approach of the "living death" to that people. Left to run its course, the approach will be slow or swift according to the drug—slow with opium, faster with morphine, galloping with heroin.

Suppose it were announced that there were more than a million lepers among our people. Think what a shock the announcement would produce. Yet drug addiction is far more incurable than leprosy, far more tragic to its victims, and is spreading like a moral and physical scourge.

In the latest hearings—those conducted by the Committee on Ways and Means, having under consideration the Porter antiheroin bill, just enacted—Dr. Amos O. Squire, chief physician of Sing Sing prison, said: "That drug addiction is on the increase there is no doubt in my mind. To illustrate, since 1918, comparing it with the year ending June, 1922, shows an increase of 900 per cent in the number of drug addicts admitted to Sing Sing prison. There has been a radical increase since 1919."

Before the same committee John W. H. Crim, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, speaking of narcotic addiction, said: "It is unquestionably increasing. About 40 per cent of the prisoners we are sending to the penitentiaries at Atlanta, Leavenworth, and McNeil Island this term of court are addicts."

On account of secretiveness no one knows just how many heroin addicts there are in the country. We know it is an army. Serious estimates for the total number of addicts as reported in the 1918–19 survey of the Treasury Department range from 200,000 to 4,000,000. Dr. Carleton Simon, special deputy police commissioner of New York City, has estimated that while only 58 ounces of heroin were lawfully prescribed by the medical profession in the city of New York in the last 12 months, 76,000 ounces were consumed. Remember that 2,000 young addicts can be created with 1 ounce. The mind that concentrates upon the heroin problem must stand appalled.

The latest and most authoritative estimates are those relating also to the city of New York, reported to the Philadelphia World Conference on Narcotic Education by the commissioner of correction, the senior medical officer, the warden and the chief of criminal identification of that city. This survey shows 60 per cent of all inmates of correctional institutions, involving cases of moral turpitude, as addicts or narcotic cases, and the official estimate for that city is placed at 200,000. Court records show that most of these addicts are heroin addicts of tender ages—in their teens or just out.

When it is remembered that heroin was only discovered in 1898 in central Germany and began to be exploited in America in 1910, it is evident that its expansion has been at an alarming rate in recent years. This is borne out by records of the narcotics division of the Treasury Department in their report of offenses against narcotic laws—the number in 1918 was 1,000; in 1919, 2,000; in 1921, over 4,000; and with steady and rapid increase had reached over 10,000 in 1925. A questionnaire sent out by a special committee under the chairmanship of Hon. John W. Davis to correctional institutions and departments of justice shows a similar alarming increase in the last few years.

The chief of the criminal identification bureau of New York reported at the Philadelphia World Conference that nearly all of the banditry, daring daylight robberies, holdups, and crimes of violence in that city are being committed by addicts, especially heroin addicts and cocaine addicts, many of them very young. The health commissioner of Chicago has made a similar report from that city.

Certainly a problem such as this, having reached such vast proportions with the attendant ravages so vitally affecting every department of human life, should arouse the solicitude of our Government and of the governments of other lands and all thoughtful citizens who are devoted to the uplifting of mankind.

INSTRUCTION FOR TEACHERS AND PARENTS REGARDING EDUCATION OF CHILDREN WITH REFERENCE TO NARCOTIC DRUGS

(Prepared in Teachers College, Columbia University, New York City)

HABITS

Two psychological principles have been observed in preparation of the following statements, and it is recommended to teachers and parents that these be generally observed in education with reference to narcotic drugs:

(1) The tendency in education with reference to any grave danger is to appeal to fear. The appeal to fear may be temporarily effective, but fear is not constructive unless it is supplemented by the determination to control the danger. A spirit of courageous control is to be preferred to a spirit of fear.

(2) Curiosity should not be whetted to stimulate dangerous experimentation with drugs. Whenever the situation calls for it, curiosity should be satisfied by complete knowledge, for full and complete knowledge will surely forestall incautious experiment.

Education with reference to narcotic drugs should conform to the best accepted practices of the general educational program in the schools. Accordingly the aim of the teacher will be to lead the child to form certain desirable habits and attitudes and to acquire the knowledge which will enable him to act ethically and intelligently. The child must know what right is; he must wish to do right; he must be able to do right.

The desirable habits which parents and teachers should help children to form with reference to narcotic drugs are as follows:

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS

(1) The child should never take anything to eat, drink, or sniff from strangers, new acquaintances unknown to parents, or acquaintances whom the child knows only slightly.

(2) He should choose for his friends only the children of whom his mother or some one in authority approves and who measures up to the ideals of true, healthy, and straightforward character.

(3) He should learn to meet bravely every situation involving unavoidable pain. (This will tend to prevent use of pain-deadening drugs for headache, etc.)

(4) He should find his keenest enjoyment in outdoor sports, such as skating, swimming, riding, etc., rather than from indoor amusements.

(5) He should avoid all habit-forming drinks, such as tea and coffee; soft drinks containing caffein, such as coca cola; and alcoholic drinks.

(6) He should avoid the use of tobacco in any form.

HIGH SCHOOLS

In addition to all the preceding habits the high-school pupils should have the following ones:

(1) He should habitually rely upon a healthful régime of living in order to keep well, instead of upon use of patent medicines or drugs.

(2) He should avoid all use of drugs except upon the prescription of a reliable physician. Headache powders or tablets in particular may be dangerous. He should learn not to give "soothing sirups" or other drugs to babies or children.

(3) He should avoid all hypodermic injections except when given by reliable physician or nurse.

(4) He does what he can to fight the drug evil whenever an opportunity occurs.

(5) He should feel responsible for the safety of younger children and should help them to obey the preceding rules and protect them from candy, powder, tablets, or any drink that may be offered by a stranger.

IDEALS, STANDARDS, AND ATTITUDES

The success of education with regard to narcotic drugs depends to a large extent upon the formation of certain character traits and upon the effectiveness of certain ideals or attitudes in influencing behavior. The beginning of these character traits should be made in babyhood. Some of the most important are as follows:

(1) Suspicion of any kind of secret or underhand amusement.

(2) Belief that to refuse to do a thing that everyone else in the group is doing because it is an underhand or harmful thing to do is brave, not cowardly.

(3) A feeling of horror and fear of drug addiction.

(4) A tendency to feel afraid of strangers who offer things to eat, drink, or sniff.

(5) A belief that the effect of an act on future happiness and usefulness is more important than a temporary immediate enjoyment.

(6) A tendency to weigh the consequences of any unfamiliar act before engaging in it.

(7) An unwillingness to "try anything once," such as eating, drinking, or sniffing unknown substances or using the hypodermic needle. "Once" may be too often.

(8) Confidence in the parents and a habit of freely discussing with them all of the day's happenings. As the result of such an attitude the child or youth would be likely to tell his parents of his first experiences with drug vendors or suspicious characters. This might lead to the early discovery of "snow parties." After the drug has been used and the drug habit formed the addict becomes very secretive, and it is difficult to discover the existence of the menace.

(9) Feeling of responsibility for supporting legislation regarding control of narcotic drugs and keeping informed regarding expert opinion of what the most effective type of legislation is.

(10) The ideal of self-control, of being able to control one's own actions for the best good of family, friends, and community, as well as personal well-being. If this ideal has become consciously worth while to the boy and girl, they will seek to avoid anything such as the drug habit, which makes self-control impossible.

(11) The ideals of good citizenship, good workmanship, and good sportsmanship. These ideals require that the boy and girl do everything possible to keep themselves physically, mentally, and morally fit; that they observe all habits which keep them in good condition and avoid all habits and indulgences which impair their ability and usefulness.

(12) The ideal of reliability. The boy or girl who can be depended upon is respected and admired. The use of narcotic drugs undermines all qualities of trustworthiness. Boys and girls who pride themselves on being dependable, trustworthy, and reliable will not knowingly use narcotic drugs.

IDEALS AND KNOWLEDGE

The important habits and ideals related to the prevention of the illegitimate use of narcotic drugs have been briefly outlined. It will have become evident that although they are the backbone of prevention, they must be supplemented by knowledge.

A considerable body of knowledge has been presented in preceding pages. Some suggestions follow regarding the use of this information with school children and the different approaches that are possible.

ELEMENTARY GRADES

In the elementary grades it is not necessary that the child should have much detailed knowledge regarding narcotic drugs. The major emphasis should be placed on the habits and attitudes listed in preceding paragraphs. The information which is given will be more effective if given in its natural relationship to the problems with which the elementary child deals than if given as isolated lessons about narcotic drugs. Effective use may be made of the following situations:

1. In safety education the child considers the problems of avoiding dangers of various kinds; he learns to recognize and avoid common poisonous plants; to avoid dangerous animals; to refrain from putting any unknown pills, berries, food, or drink into the mouth. The avoidance of the dangers of narcotic drugs has an obvious place here.

2. In nature study the child learns that certain plants have poisonous leaves, berries, or flowers, or that poisonous products may be made from them. He may also discover that some plants have medicinal value. The medicinal value and also the harmful poisonous results of the use of the poppy derivatives may be mentioned. In nature study the pupil also acquires an understanding of the necessary conditions for growth—proper food, light, air, moisture, temperature, etc. He may learn in this connection that certain poisons hinder growth and that narcotic drugs are such poisons.

3. In study of food the child learns what are good foods and drinks for human beings, and that only those substances and no others should ever be taken into the mouth, except when given by parents, nurse, or physician.

4. Temperance education with reference to alcoholic drinks may usually be extended to include reference to narcotic drugs. The same moral reasons for abstinence apply in both cases.

HIGH SCHOOLS

In high schools, more extensive knowledge should be given. This is the period of danger.

1. The social sciences—history, civics, geography, and economics—form a natural setting for studying the problems of drug addiction as they affect our civilization:

(a) Its effect on our criminal problem; (b) its effect upon the home; (c) its effect upon the individual's ability to earn a living; (d) its growing menace, as indicated by the history of the production and use of narcotic drugs; (e) its world significance, the necessity for international control, and attempts at international regulation at various conferences.

China's attempt to rid herself of the opium menace and the selfish greed of the other world powers should be studied as a significant historical event. Emphasis should be placed upon the fundamental idea that narcotic drugs should be kept out of human reach by world control of the production in all countries, of raw opium and cocoa leaves so that there is no surplus beyond the supply needed for medical and scientific purposes. This should show the future citizen his responsibility in relation to the support of any legislative measures regarding drugs.

2. Biography and literature may be used to show the devastating effect of drug addiction in the lives of famous characters in history and literatures; e. g., Poe and DeQuincy.

3. In chemistry the student may learn the consumption of narcotic drugs, reach a scientific understanding of why they are poisons and what their chemical action is. This will necessarily be simply presented in high schools, but the student will gain the scientific point of view.

4. In biology or physiology the student may learn the effects of poisons upon the growth and life of living tissues and upon the organism as a whole. He may learn here that the use of narcotic drugs destroys the powers of reproduction, and this will give him the scientific basis for understanding the disastrous effects of drug addiction upon the preservation of the race.

5. In psychology the student discovers the laws of habit formation, the effect of drugs upon the nervous system, and the terrific difficulties in breaking the drug habit.

EXAMPLES FOR LESSONS IN SCHOOLS

Two detailed suggestions for lessons on the drug problems:

These lessons are not to be taught word for word in all situations. They are included to give a concrete idea of certain principles of method especially.

(1) The use of a real problem as the basis of the lesson. The first lesson would be taught if there were definite rumors or evidence of drug traffic among children in the neighborhood. The second, if newspapers and magazines were printing articles concerning the prevalence and danger of drugs in the community.

(2) The presentation of story or facts in such a way as to have the convictions and conclusions come from the children—not from the teacher.

(3) Lessons dealing with the drug problem should be taught with all the earnestness and force of personality that is possible by a teacher who feels the importance of this subject.

It would be better not to teach such lessons at all than to teach them in a superficial, perfunctory way, which might simply arouse curiosity rather than fear of the drug evil and the will to control it.

TEACHER. Several of the students this week brought in clippings from newspapers about drug addiction. (Reads parts from clippings.) These clippings say that the drug menace is a very serious problem. What are some points you would consider in deciding how important the problem is?

PUPIL. What kinds of drugs are most dangerous?

PUPIL. Are drugs being easily made and sold?

PUPIL. Do many people take drugs?

PUPIL. Does taking a drug one or two times do any harm?

PUPIL. Can a person who has been a drug addict ever be cured?

PUPIL. What effect do the drugs have on health and character?

PUPIL. What effect does the person who takes drugs have on other people?

TEACHER. (Writes the questions suggested on the board.) These are all important points. Let us try to answer the first question, What drugs are mentioned in the clippings read?

PUPILS. Opium, morphine, cocaine, heroin.

TEACHER. When we think of the effects of opium smoking—some of the Chinese victims look scarcely human—it would seem that opium must be the most dangerous. But heroin is nearly ten times more powerful than opium. Would there be any other factor beside the concentration, making one of these more dangerous than another?

PUPIL. If one were easier to take than another.

TEACHER. Yes. Heroin is made in the form of a white powder that can be easily "sniffed." Others require a hypodermic needle. Can you see how that makes heroin especially dangerous?

PUPIL. Yes. Most people would be suspicious of the use of a needle, but the white powder would look quite harmless to anyone who didn't know what it was.

TEACHER. Exactly so. Is there any other factor which makes these drugs so dangerous?

PUPIL. They can be easily smuggled in.

TEACHER. Yes; it is estimated that $20,000 worth of opium can be packed in one suitcase and that 2,000 addicts can be produced with one ounce of heroin. As John said, that makes it easy for people to smuggle it into the country and sell it to their victims. The next question, "Do many people take drugs?" is more difficult to answer—why?

PUPIL. People keep it a secret—they feel it is a disgrace.

TEACHER. Yes. The actual number of drug addicts has been estimated to be from 250,000 to 2,000,000. Prison authorities at Leavenworth in 1921 reported 15.5 per cent of drug addicts and in 1922, 24 per cent. The chief physician of Sing Sing says that there was an increase in addicts of 900 per cent from 1919 to 1922. What do these figures show?

PUPIL. That it is becoming a more serious problem all the time.

TEACHER. Your next question asks, "Does taking a drug one or two times do any harm?" Does being bitten by a poisonous snake once or twice do any harm? Does playing with fire once or twice ever do any harm? Taking a drug once may result in the drug habit. The more powerful the drug, the more certain its quick habit-forming effect. Heroin taken six times will make an addict—a slave to the drug. (Tells the story of Wallace Reid and his unsuccessful fight with the drug habit.)

(The teacher similarly takes up a discussion of the other questions proposed, in every case drawing conclusions and suggestions from the children, and supplying information herself as needed.)

Teacher finally asks: What are your conclusions concerning this problem of drug addiction?

Pupils make summary.

TEACHER. What can we as a class do to prevent the spread of the drug evil?

Pupils give suggestions:

If we ever get into a situation where boys or girls are about to take any of these drugs we can tell them what the consequences would be, and prevent them from taking the drug. We can help make outdoor sports more popular than indoor sports.

We can report to the police any suspicious-looking people.

We can take medicine only when the doctor gives it to us.

TEACHER. These are good suggestions. We will be prepared to be master of any situation of danger if we meet it, and all other times forget about it, get thrills from outdoor sports as John said, and "fill every unforgiving minute" by doing something profitable and interesting to ourselves and worth while to others.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ALLEGED MEXICAN PROPAGANDA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, not long ago the Senate was astounded by the disclosures of the Hearst publications of a disgraceful and scandalous charge against four United States Senators. My name was in that list. As soon as I learned that my name was involved I said, "An enemy hath done this." Practically everyone who has spoken to me about the matter has expressed opinions that agree entirely with mine.

I am unable to say at this time just who all had a hand in the cowardly, sneaking, and infamous plan to associate my name with the despicable Hearst-Mexican scandal. Considering all the facts and circumstances in the case there is no escape from the conclusion that it is the direct result of a conspiracy on the part of certain Roman Catholics to frame, injure, and if possible to destroy me for the work I did in the Senate to defeat the efforts of the Knights of Columbus and the Roman Catholic hierarchy to involve the United States in war with Mexico on behalf of the Catholic Church.

The man from whom Hearst got the forged papers is a Roman Catholic. He testified that he obtained them from Roman Catholic clerks in the Mexican Government and that he told them he wanted the papers for Bishop Diaz, a Roman Catholic bishop of Mexico. Hearst's wife is a Roman Catholic.

Mr. President, when I was doing everything in my power in the Senate to prevent the Roman Catholics from using the United States Army to fight the battles of the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico, I was attacked most viciously by the entire Roman Catholic press of the country and Catholic priests denounced me in their pulpits for daring to stand in the way of the war program of the Pope of Rome. They were willing to kill American boys to restore the Catholic Church to power in Mexico. I was the only Senator who laid bare the Roman Catholic program to get us in war. I received threatening letters from Roman Catholics telling me that if I did not cease my opposition that they would murder me. A Catholic priest in New York, named Belford, published a statement suggesting that the Catholics should hire thugs to waylay and mob me.

During that debate last winter the People's Forum, Ohio State Journal, complimented me for exposing the Roman Catholic conspiracy to get our country into war with Mexico, and added that "anything may happen to Senator HEFLIN, from ostracism to murder." But I never dreamed that they would resort to such a low-down, sneaking, and disgraceful thing as this attempt to destroy my good name and assassinate my character.

Scores of American citizens have written me that they believed the money paid to manufacture the Hearst Catholic Mexican scandal was furnished by the Knights of Columbus. It will be remembered that the Knights of Columbus raised at Philadelphia a million dollars to be used in carrying on propaganda for war with Mexico. I pointed out in my speeches in the Senate that the Knights of Columbus had passed a resolution denouncing our policy of peace toward Mexico and "demanding" that it "be changed forthwith." And I called attention to the fact that a Roman Catholic Congressman, Mr. BOYLAN, of New York City, introduced a resolution in the House demanding that we immediately sever diplomatic relations with Mexico. That resolution meant war and I said

so. That resolution was supported in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House by nobody but Roman Catholics. The grievance stated, and the cause for war made known, was purely and wholly a Roman Catholic question, and the reasons for urging the passage of the Boylan resolution were "the persecution of Catholics and the efforts to destroy the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico."

I said then that it was not an American question, but a Roman Catholic question, and that the affairs of the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico are none of our business, and I said: "No American boy is going to be carried off to Mexico and killed in such a conflict if I can prevent it."

In discharging my duty to my country I have incurred the displeasure and brought down upon my head the wrath of certain intolerant and bigoted Roman Catholics. The misrepresentations and scurrilous insinuations made against me by leading Roman Catholic newspapers since the Hearst Catholic Mexican scandal was investigated by the Senate committee have confirmed me in the conviction that those who inspired and initiated the diabolical scheme to involve my name in this scandal were Roman Catholics who were mad with me and who were willing to employ any dishonorable means possible to do me injury. So in seeking some one who would lend himself to the miserably corrupt and contemptible business of giving it publicity, they sought and obtained the service of William Randolph Hearst. He was willing, without a scintilla of truth to support him, to drag the names of four United States Senators into a horrible and loathsome scandal when he knew that they were innocent. After causing my name and the names of three other Senators to be associated with a dishonorable act—an act that nobody but a thief and scoundrel would be guilty of—he told the committee, under oath, that he did not believe that any one of the Senators had ever been approached on the subject—that he was convinced that they were all innocent and had had nothing whatever to do with the matter in question. And yet he was willing to purchase, and did purchase for publication, "manufactured falsehoods" and "forged papers" from a Roman Catholic Mexican thief. He was willing to bring four United States Senators into disrepute and blacken their characters on statements that he himself admits were false. He is willing to deal with Roman Catholic Mexican thieves in order to traduce and slander Senators of his own country. Willing to wallow in the cesspool of corruption and shame, and then hang his head like a thief come to judgment, and by his conduct and statements confess himself to be a notorious slanderer, corruptionist, and scoundrel.

Mr. President, the Catholic Union and Times, of Buffalo, N. Y., subscriber to the National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service at Washington, has this to say, under the caption "Senator HEFLIN":

> While it has been apparent in Washington circles for some time that Senator HEFLIN was a paid lecturer of these anti-Catholic organizations, his admission during the hearing of the Senate committee on the Hearst Mexican revelations came as a great surprise. He also forecast a new series of speeches to be delivered on the floor of the Senate in the near future. One can readily understand what these outbursts will disclose. Mr. HEFLIN will warn of the danger of Catholicism. He will tell of the plans of the Knights of Columbus to rule the Nation and of the menacing shadow of Pope Pius XI. Senator HEFLIN'S own State has denounced him. His days in the Senate are numbered. The State of Alabama can be counted on to deal him a crushing blow when he again seeks reelection.

Mr. President, that article, on the face of it, discloses malice and hatred in the hearts of the priests and the clerical officials back of it in the Catholic Church. It discloses knowledge of this conspiracy about which I am speaking to-day. I am satisfied that the editors and managers of this newspaper, most of whom are Catholic priests and high officials in the Catholic organization, knew that I was to be "framed," and that they had a hand in it.

Let me read a few excerpts from letters received on this subject. They clearly show what the people generally think about the efforts made to injure me.

Here is a letter from California dated December 15 and addressed to me. It reads, in part, as follows:

> If it had not been for the four Senators named by Hearst, this country would be at war with Mexico to-day; and not only that, but many a big steal would have been pulled off. If they could but put Senators BORAH, LA FOLLETTE, HEFLIN, and NORRIS out of the way, they would have everything their own way; but, thank God, they are on the job and any amount of dirty work they do will not disturb my confidence in these men.
> JAMES F. COOPER.

Here is another one from Findlay, Ohio, addressed to me and dated December 19:

> We are led to believe that the Roman Catholic clericals are the ones that engineered the so-called Hearst exposures in the Mexican situation. We hope that no let up will happen and the guilt be placed where it belongs, and we are willing to gamble that "Rome" had a hand in it.
> C. R. GALLOWAY.

Here is one from Camden, S. C., addressed to me:

> I am a stranger to you, but judging from your record you are a man "after my own heart." I admire a man who is not afraid "to speak out in meetin'." Seems like your friends, the Roman Catholics, hit you a foul blow. No one believes the charge.
> H. C. HADDY, Jr.

Here is one from Norfolk, Va., which is addressed to me:

> It has not been very long ago since the files of the Secretary of State of the United States were tampered with to such an extent that original documents were altered or copied. This alone is enough proof that the forces that are behind the affair are powerful.
> T. W. DAUGHERTY.

Here is one from Syracuse, N. Y., the home State of Alfred E. Smith, the gentleman that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] so eloquently pictures as the next nominee of the Democratic Party. I will have more to say about that a little later on. [Laughter.] This letter is addressed to me:

> The enemy has at last touched a vital spot. We will now proceed to find him and destroy him. Never fear, THOMAS, we know you and believe in you and trust you fully. You will be vindicated and the enemy of America will be uncovered and Hearst will find that no Knights of Columbus money will buy war with Mexico. You did your duty and Americans trust you. We are back of you.
> Rev. B. MONROE POSTER.

Here is a letter from Richmond, Va., addressed to me:

> Hearst's attack on you, BORAH, NORRIS, and LA FOLLETTE is alleged to be a "Jesuit" trick. * * * All Irish-Catholic papers are "egging" their readers on to create trouble and the Irish-Catholic prelates in the Catholic hierarchy are the worst offenders.
> S. SAXE.

Here is a telegram from Kansas City, Mo., addressed to me:

> We had the pleasure of hearing you speak in Kansas City and the honor to shake your hand, and we just want to say that we resent with all vigor possible the imputations the Hearst papers are casting against you and the other Senators, and wish you would convey to them also our complete belief in their integrity and high principles, as well as yourself. We are of the belief that it is a fraud and is the direct result of directions of the Pope or his emissaries.
> W. A. HAWK AND WIFE.

Another from Los Angeles, Calif., addressed to me:

> It is a disgraceful state of affairs when a publisher can assail public officials without proof or reason except probably being paid a portion of the $1,000,000 raised by the Knight of Columbus.

Another one from Oakland, Leon County, Tex., addressed to me:

> Just a few lines to let you know that the true-blooded Americans are with you in your stand regarding Mexico and the Nicaraguan question. Also we are with you on the Hearst charges against you. It seems that the Hearst charges are simply a part of the program inaugurated by the Knights of Columbus in 1926 in Philadelphia to try to involve this country in war with Mexico.
> WILLIAM HUBB GILL, Sr.

Another one from Los Angeles addressed to me:

> This man Hearst is nothing but a paid hireling of the Church of Rome. He is aided and abetted by that interest in this country. His attacks upon you and the other three Senators are inspired by the "fine Italian hand" of the interest I mention above. This is in retaliation for your stand on Mexican affairs last session of Congress. * * *
> B. W. BROWN.

Here is another one from Wilmerding, Pa., addressed to me:

> The only organization to have a motive for this plot would be the Roman Catholic political machine or church.
> If it can be proved that the Roman church was behind this, of which I think there is little doubt, Al Smith's ambition for nomination would get a death blow, as would also the hierarchy's, for the control of this country.

* * * * * * *

If these United States had a few more Senators like you—

Well, that has such a fulsome compliment to me that I will not read it. You can get the idea from what I did read, though, of what was in the mind of this patriot.

As one who admires the brave fight you are making against the Roman Catholic hierarchy in the United States, permit me to make a suggestion. I have heard it stated that Hearst's documents about Mexico were worked up by the Catholics, and that he received a substantial sum of money from the Knights of Columbus here to print them.

Mr. President, I have any number of these letters; but I have read enough of them to let the Senate know exactly what is in the minds of the people of this Nation who are not yet afraid to speak above a whisper against the Roman Catholic political machine.

The Catholic Union and Times, Buffalo, December 22, 1927, has these headlines reporting the hearings in the committee here in Washington:

Senator HEFLIN'S "patriotism" shown in terms of dollars. Admits being paid by K. K. K. for lecturing. Alabama solon makes admission at Senate probe of Hearst Mexican revelations.

Now, get this:

Propagandist for Calles. Other anti-Catholic organizations also paid United States Senator for speaking in country.

* * * * * * *

Now that Senator HEFLIN, of Alabama, has sworn before a Senate committee not only that he took money from klansmen, Protestant ministers, Masons, and others for lectures on the Mexican situation last summer, but also that his lectures were of the same character as his anti-Catholic speeches in the Senate—

And so forth.

In the legislature of his own State of Alabama, a derisive resolution was offered proposing that HEFLIN be made an admiral and be posted at sea to fire his "most deadly verbosity" upon the impending "attack of the Pope of Rome. * * *."

In July, however, a somewhat different face was put on the Alabaman's vocal efforts when it was learned that he had caused his speeches in the Senate to be collected into a pamphlet of 138 pages and was offering it for sale at stated prices. "Customers" might buy the booklet in quantities at reduced price, he assured them.

Mr. President, they knew that that statement was absolutely false. Mr. President, most Senators here recall the fight that I made in January and February, a fight opened by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—the able, fearless, incorruptible Senator from the State of Idaho—who had in mind nothing but the good of his country in protecting the lives of our boys and remaining at peace with a neighboring republic. He made a speech in this body, and he warned us of how dangerously near we were to war with Mexico.

The next day after his great speech I spoke about other activities in the same direction, efforts being made by the Knights of Columbus to involve us in war. I called to the attention of the Senate a resolution passed by them at Philadelphia in which they denounced this Government's policy of peace toward Mexico and demanded that it cease immediately. They did not request that it be considered and modified if possible, but they were so bold and brazen and arrogant that they "demanded" that it cease "immediately."

I called attention to that. The New York World had an editorial about that time, saying that if the people of the United States did not want war with Mexico they had better write to their Members of the House and Senate, because we were dangerously near to war with Mexico. I submit to you, Senators, and to the country, was it not time that I was speaking, and other Senators, against a war then threatening our country? Was it not time that I was making a protest if I cared anything about the peace and happiness of my own country, the lives of the boys of the United States? Was it not my duty to take a stand against such a war when there was no excuse under heaven for such a war?

I said to the Senate then, and to the country, that it was a Roman Catholic question, that it was not an American question, and that we had no business to marshal our soldiers and go off and fight the battles of the Roman Catholic Church. That was the stand that I took; and by taking that stand I drove from cover the most insidious and dangerous and deadly political machine that ever had its existence in any country on the earth—the Roman Catholic political machine. Without rhyme or reason the press of that machine attacked me from one end of the country to the other, all of them denouncing me, not a single American note sounded amongst them all—Catholic, Roman Catholic, allegiance to the Government of Rome above this Government manifested in every line that they wrote against me; and I have been picked out by them to make an object lesson of for you other Senators. I dare them; I defy them all. I have taken my stand for my country against the invisible government of the Pope of Rome, and I am going to uncover it in the United States in spite of what the Jesuits may do with dagger or poison. I have consecrated myself to the service, and I bare my breast to all these enemies of my country.

Did anybody ever hear of a more villainous attack than this made on me since this committee investigated the scandalous charges that these Roman Catholics inspired against me, misrepresenting me still? One of them showed what he had in mind when they put my name in it. He said, "Senator HEFLIN will be defeated. His days are numbered." That is what they hope. Well, they have already picked out two gentlemen—I am not going to call their names now, but I will call them enough before I finish operating on them in my State—they have already picked out two who are ready to swallow their Protestant convictions and crawl on their bellies like serpents before the Pope, and kiss the cardinal's ring or do anything else, in order to get a seat in the Senate; but there is not one of them ever born of woman who can beat me in my State. I defy these evil, un-American forces of Rome. I do not fear them.

I have not got time to consider what may happen to me. I am ready to accept whatever comes to me. I will not swallow my convictions for office. I never counted the cost in my life when I took a stand on a political question or on any other question. I am ready to spend and be spent in the cause of my country, and I am deeply indignant at the efforts made by Roman Catholics to besmirch my name. I have always done what I thought was right as God gave me the light to see what is right. When I take a stand I feel that I am doing my duty; and when I feel that I am doing my duty I am willing to take what comes, whether it is victory or defeat.

Now, listen:

A priest group up in Buffalo said that I had been denounced in my State. A bigger falsehood was never uttered. I spoke 35 times in my State in September and October. I never had so many calls in my life. The halls in two-thirds of the places would not hold the audiences, and in every place where I spoke the audience rose en masse. There were not over 5 out of an audience of 7,000 that did not stand up and indorse my fight on this particular question.

Talk about my being denounced! I have not been denounced. The patriotic people of my State are too high-minded, courageous, and well grounded in the principles of Martin Luther and the Democratic Party to bow their knee to this veiled, insidious monster of the political machine of the Roman Catholic Church who has his habitat in Tammany Hall.

One smart Aleck in my State, who has already been defeated for the Senate—and defeated badly—by my distinguished colleague who sits at my right, had a hand in getting up a resolution to designate me as the "admiral" to guard against the Pope. The new and inexperienced member of the legislature hardly knew what he was introducing. He asked them, when they handed it to him, "Is there any comeback in this to me?" They said, "No"; and he sent it up and they read it; and that is all that was done with it. It was referred to a committee and died in the committee.

While thinking over that ridiculous performance of ambitious but dead politicians, I wrote a few lines about the gentleman who introduced the resolution, and since this Union and Times paper refers to that incident I am going to read it to you. I did not even know this fellow who had introduced this resolution.

Old Uncle Johnnie used to say,
  You'll find, as a rule,
In every legislature
  At least one fool.

Who is this man Edmondson?
  I never heard of him;
Is he low and stocky,
  Or is he tall and slim?

Slick and smooth he must have been,
  When asking Jefferson County for a legislative ride,
He was able to use a false Protestant skin
  To cover his Catholic hide.

But now he throws his disguise off,
  It appears to be so at least,
And in the legislature
  Does the bidding of the priest.

A handy man for crooks to use,
In problems up for solution;
They write their stuff and hand to him,
As they did this resolution.

And then he introduces it,
And, lo, it bears his name,
Then Roman priests smile on him,
And he thinks he's won fame.

And fame it is for Edmondson,
The Vatican choir will sing,
As he crawls on his all fours,
To kiss the cardinal's ring.

Perhaps he's never traveled
Very far from home,
But the Al Smith bunch will give him now
A nice long trip to Rome.

His youthful dreams realized,
Fulfilled his life-long hope,
When he beholds with joyous eyes,
His secret lord, the Pope.

They'll kill the fatted calf for him,
And spread a Roman feast,
And everywhere Edmondson turns,
He'll see a Roman priest.

They'll pour soft music in his ears,
And sing to him, hi, ho,
Then take him to where the Pope is,
And let him kiss his toe.

They'll lead him about the Vatican then,
Where grows the tall green grass,
Then take him to the Pope again,
And let him kiss the lass
Who will guide him through purgatory,
Under the Pope's field glass.

Then bring him back to Birmingham,
The remainder of his life to dwell,
Then put him in a casket,
That he himself doth sell,
Then turn him over to the priest,
And let him go to hell.

Mr. President, this Roman Catholic machine and Knights of Columbus régime sought to keep my speeches from getting into the press. They succeeded with a large portion of the press.

They then sought to keep me from mailing my speeches to the people in the country who wanted them and were willing to pay the Government for printing them. Let me tell the Senate what occurred. I received fully 5,000 letters requesting copies of my speeches. I said, "I am not able to have these speeches printed and sent to people all over the country." I got up a compilation of different speeches into one, 138 pages, to circulate in my own State, where I knew this Roman Catholic machine would attack me and misrepresent me, where I had already seen they were spending money to buy up newspapers, to poison public sentiment, and to misrepresent me and my work in the Senate. So I fixed this speech up in one big pamphlet and inquired what copies would cost. I paid $336 for the first thousand and $44 a thousand for the remainder.

Then I conceived this idea: I would let the people have the speeches printed themselves and pay for them, and I would order them for them. So hundreds and hundreds of requests came, and I ordered the speeches. They would buy 500 from the Government, not from me. I never made a cent out of them, of course. The Government would send them to my office and my office would do the work of sending them out to the people, to be distributed in the localities.

I submit to Senators that that was fair and proper. Every two years both national committees get speeches of some Senator or Member of the House and send them out in bulk to various localities, to be distributed locally. What do you suppose happened about this? This Union and Times said that I wrote to customers that I would sell the speeches cheap, in bulk. No such thing happened. They knew that they told a falsehood when they stated that. I have been out money on them myself, because every time they put the type up it costs me about $18, and I am doing that and the people are still getting them.

What do you suppose they are doing in various localities? Roman Catholic postmasters are telling the people the speeches are not frankable. They are making them put stamps on them, doing all they can to keep them from reaching the people. What do you suppose happened here in the Post Office Department? This Roman Catholic machine went down to the Post Office Department and attacked me, and tried to prevent these speeches being mailed out. Did you have any idea they were doing such things in this country? They do not want anything against their work known to the people. They suppress it wherever they can.

They went down to the Washington Post, one of their agents, had published article after article attacking me, said that I was abusing my franking privilege, and then had to admit at last that it was found that "Senator HEFLIN was within his rights"; but they never published my statement showing that I was within my rights and any of the facts about it. Is that fair? I am telling you these things so you will know the story of this fight I made against war with Mexico, and the penalty they tried to make me pay for making that fight.

They sent lecturers throughout the United States, who lectured on Mexico, giving their side of it, telling about mistreatment of priests and nuns, and the people commenced to wire me when Congress adjourned, "Won't you come and deliver us an address on the Mexican question? The Knights of Columbus had a lecturer here. He presented the other side. We can not get the truth from the press. Won't you come?" I started out speaking on the Mexican question in that way. The first speech I made was for the pastor of Christ Church in Clinton, Iowa. They said they would pay me $250 to come up there and make a speech. When I got up there and addressed 2,000 people, I saw that this preacher was looking after the financial end of it, and I took off a hundred dollars. I spoke many times in Iowa, and I found in Dubuque that the Catholics had taken charge of the public schools, had turned every Protestant teacher out and put Catholic teachers in charge. The board of trustees elected were Catholics, and every one of them sent his children to parochial schools. That is why they want to suppress me, because I am telling you what they are doing wherever they have the power. That is what they will do to you and me if they ever get that power in the United States.

Mr. President, they talk to me about nominating Al Smith! It will never be the deliberate judgment of the patriotic people of the Democratic Party. They are not going to do it.

Roman Catholic lecturers have been going about the country advocating interference in Mexico. Who paid them? The Knights of Columbus paid them out of that million dollars they raised at Philadelphia, and they are assailing me for letting the people in the various localities of the country pay my expenses and an honorarium to come and give them the truth on the subject. Several Senators go out and deliver addresses that way during their vacations, and it is all right. It helps to educate the people on these questions. In my case it was getting important truths to them, which they could not get in any other way. The newspapers would not give it to them.

Let me tell you what I found when I got there. At nearly every place I spoke I found that Catholic priests and Knights of Columbus had tried to keep the Protestant people—Masons, Junior Order of American Mechanics, Klansmen, Odd Fellows, Red Men, and other Protestant orders—from having a hall for me to speak in. What do you think of that, Senators? Frequently, I found that a Knight of Columbus had lectured in the hall that I was to speak in—just two or three nights before. Priests were busy; Knights of Columbus, under their command, protested against an American Senator telling about their efforts to kill our boys in a war for the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico.

That is why they want to get my scalp, because I tell the people truths about them that some public men, strange to say, fear to speak about, even in a whisper. They are trained in the business of guarding the interests of the Roman Catholic machine. You let any public man say a word against their activities, and they go to him, and if he does not apologize and promise his soul to them, they will defeat him if they can. It is time the Protestants were waking up, and when they find a Protestant bowing the knee to this insidious Roman Catholic power, they should say to him, "If you are going to do that, we are going to beat you." Then, let him come out in the open and be an American, and do the fair and right thing by all, Protestants, Catholics, and Jews.

I am not fighting the Catholics as citizens; I am not fighting their mode of worship; if they want that particular mode, let them have it. But I am fighting the enemy of my country—the dangerous political machine of the Roman Catholic Church. That machine noses its way into business. They will boycott the business man who takes a stand against their activities when he feels that it is his duty as an American to do so. They will boycott a newspaper that tells the truth about their un-American conduct regarding matters vital to the welfare and preservation of constitutional government in America. The Roman Catholic political machine and what it represents are first and foremost in all that it does.

Mr. President, I spoke at Dubois, Pa., and one of the members of the committee, a fine Mason, said, "One of the papers would not publish the notice that you were going to speak. The editor had agreed to do it, and we paid him, and the Knights of Columbus and the priests went to him and said to him, 'If you publish that statement, we will boycott your paper.'" He said, "I haven't anything to do with getting up the statement. They brought the statement here giving notice of Senator HEFLIN'S speech. I am just going to publish it, without comment." They said, "If you do, we will boycott your paper." And he would not publish it.

Then the courageous Protestants of Dubois—God bless them—went down and said, "If you do not print it, if you deny us this publicity—we have already paid you—giving notice of our public speaking, if you are going to let the Roman Catholics run your paper and this community, we will boycott you." And they did. Scores and scores of subscribers quit that week. You have got to fight them with fire. I am satisfied that many Senators here did not know that such things were being done by this Roman Catholic régime in the United States. Did you have any idea they were doing these things? They are worried about Senator HEFLIN spreading his anti-Catholic speeches around! I was getting important truths to the country. Truths that should be in possession of every Gentile and Jew who loves this country and wants to see its free institutions preserved in their integrity.

I also spoke at Butler, Pa. The chairman of the committee said, "Senator, the members of the school board want to see you." They were in charge of the public school hall. I said, "I will be glad to see them." They came to see me. They said, "The Catholic priest objects to your speaking on Mexico. He is willing for you to speak if you will not mention the Catholic Church in connection with the Mexican situation." I said, "There is no war question involved except that injected by the agents of the Roman Catholic Church."

No Protestant or Jew is back of the movement, nobody but Roman Catholics. When they told me that the priest would not consent for me to speak unless I would agree to his terms it got under my American skin, and I said, "A Roman Catholic priest is to tell me what I can speak about? There are not enough of them in the United States to do that. I do not ask a Catholic priest what I may speak about or may not speak about. I am going to discuss this question just like I have discussed it everywhere I have spoken, and tell the truth about it, and if they do not agree that I am telling the truth, let them answer my speech." Then with one voice they said, "Certainly the Senator can speak in the school hall." I said, "If you people have reached the point where you have got to go and ask the Roman Catholic priest and Knights of Columbus whether you can have speaking in this community or not, you Protestants, God knows you have fallen to a mighty low level." They said, "No; we will not do it. You will have the hall."

What do you suppose that priest told them when they went back and said, "Yes; Senator HEFLIN will speak in the school hall." He said, "All right; you will have trouble at the speaking. I can not control the Knights of Columbus." You ought to have heard the opening remarks of my speech that night. I told them what had occurred at the beginning with the school board and said, "The priest said he could not control the Knights of Columbus and we would have trouble. Think of that! A mob of Roman Catholics willing to break up public speaking, to terrorize public assembly in your community, threatening violence to frighten people away." The house was packed. There were 2,000 or more. I said, "Fellow citizens, this is America, and if they start anything here tonight and the priest will not control them, we will control them," and that American audience would have controlled them too.

Do you know what happened to me that night? Friends suggested that I might need armed guards to escort me from the hotel to the public-school hall in a community in this great Protestant country, where thugs were threatening to do violence to an American Senator who had dared to come and tell the truth about their efforts to kill American boys in the cause of the Pope of Rome. Some of them were armed who escorted me to the hall and back to my hotel, here in the United States, in Pennsylvania, where the Roman Catholic spirit was rampant, and had threatened to do violence to me if I dared to speak about Mexico, because this priest said he could not control the Knights of Columbus.

What else do you suppose they did? I spoke at Bethlehem, Pa., in the finest school auditorium that I ever saw. It was built as a memorial to the brave boys who died in France. I said, "This is the finest school hall I have ever seen." One of the citizens present on the platform said, "By the way, Senator, did we tell you about the efforts of the Catholics to keep us from having this hall for you to speak in"? I said, "No. Why"? The priests and the Knights of Columbus opposed it. They demanded that we have a meeting of the board after a majority of the board had already agreed for you to have it. They insisted on having a meeting. Two members of the board are Roman Catholics and one of them a Protestant who married a Catholic. They fought it to the last ditch and had a vote of six Protestants granting the use of the hall, and three others, two Catholics and the Protestant who married a Catholic, voting to deny us the use of the hall. That was right up here in Pennsylvania in our own United States.

I am talking to some people who do not understand this question at all. They have not the slightest insight to what is going on right here in the United States. They do not understand and appreciate the mysterious and sneaking things that are going on behind the screen, but I am telling them about it. This un-American spirit has got to change or there is going to be trouble. Either that or Americans have got to fall down and obey this Roman Catholic machine's edict. You are either going to stand up against it and combat its evil influence and activities or you are going to let it keep moving along in various directions until some sad day it will be too late perhaps to save ourselves from its destructive power.

Last spring I was booked to speak at Ridgeway, Pa. They had rented the theater and paid $150 for it. I saw the receipt. The theater company advertised my speaking on its cards. "Friday night Senator HEFLIN lectures on the Mexican question." They had announced it to the public themselves.

What do you suppose happened? When I was on the train going there a gentleman from that town boarded the same train. He was disturbed and indignant. He had paid the $150 and had expected to get his money back from tickets sold. They had sold, I believe, 1,200 tickets, and the theater man came to them and told them that the Roman Catholic priests and the Knights of Columbus had objected to me speaking in the theater on the Mexican question, and had threatened to boycott the theater and that he had to withdraw the permit for its use for that purpose. The man who had rented it said, "You can not withdraw it. It is advertised. You have my money and I have your receipt." The theater man said "I will pay it back." He said, "I will not accept it. The tickets have been sold in accordance with our contract and the people will be here to hear Senator HEFLIN give the facts about the Mexican question."

That night the theater was closed and dark. The manager was away hiding out. The sheriff was there to keep people who held tickets from entering. A courageous American judge up there issued an order requiring them to open the theater and let those people use it to hear me speak, and the Roman Catholic official, whose duty it was to serve the order of the judge, hid out and could not be found. One thousand two hundred men and women peaceful, law-abiding Protestant citizens of America stood there in the dark in front of that theater. They were not permitted to enter. They had bought tickets. A number of citizens came back to the hotel and told me what had happened. They wanted me to speak in the open air but I told them I could not do that. They said they had nothing but a Masonic hall that had only about 250 chairs in it, but which would hold a thousand people or more. I said, "Are your people willing to stand"? "Oh, yes; anywhere if you will speak to them." I said, "All right," and I spoke to them, too. After I finished my speech a Protestant preacher, who had been asleep on this question prior to that time, jumped up and said, "I want to say a word. I had no idea that such a spirit lurked in the breast of these people here. Henceforth I am a soldier in the service." We had our meeting in spite of the reprehensible and un-American conduct of intolerant Roman Catholics.

Senators, would you have believed that such a thing as that could happen right here in the United States?

In every place I went, without a single exception, I heard of their efforts to prevent Protestant people from having a hall in which to hear me discuss the Mexican question and the efforts of Roman Catholics to involve us in war with Mexico. At Bloomington, Ill., the treasurer of the Civic League of Illinois who was with me told me about a Catholic boy who had left the audience where I was speaking to go home to get a gun to come back and shoot me, and some older heads among Catholics got hold of him and kept him from carrying out his threat. Senators, can you even imagine the presence in America of activities that will produce such a spirit in the youth of that group of people living here in the United States?

Mr. President, I am telling the Senate and the country what some of these people are doing quietly, secretly, and sometimes in the open out in the States that you do not know about, and when you discover them and catch them cold they jump suddenly and appear startled and look innocent and exclaim: "Intolerance and bigotry." That is their old stock in store. I agree with Voltaire and Garibaldi and General Grant and Lincoln that the Jesuit institutions are dangerous institutions in anybody's country. They are here in Washington City—yes, here in the United States. They are using their mental processes to manipulate the minds of those they want to control, and I fear they have had hold of my friend the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], trying to make him think that Al Smith has some chance to be nominated. You know you call up somebody over the telephone in order to send a message to them. Well, these Jesuits use their mental messages on weak-minded people, but I do not refer to the Senator from New York when I make that suggestion. They try to direct your thoughts. I have a pamphlet here which shows that they are sending their messages now broadcast, trying to control the people's minds in favor of Al Smith and Roman Catholicism. They have got a big job on hand. The Jesuits and the Roman Catholic machine have certainly got a big job on their hands.

Mr. President, I have told of some of the experiences that I have had on my rounds to reach the people who wanted to hear the truth regarding the Mexican question. I am a poor man and not able to tour the States on a speaking tour at my own expense. So American patriots who wanted to hear me on this question arranged for the meetings. I had the checks they gave me cashed in the disbursing office of the Senate. I was glad to go, although tired out physically when the last session was over. I was glad to go and talk to these people and let them know what was going on and arouse them, if I could, to the dangers that threatened.

For all that I have been plotted against and drawn into a scandal, and the charge was made by these scoundrels that I was being paid, that I was accepting a bribe to fight to keep my country out of war. I was told by people wherever I went about the country, "You have attacked and opposed the Roman Catholic program. That bunch will never let up on you. They will pursue and punish you. Be on your guard always."

Mr. President, I had a letter from Baltimore last spring which said "they have sent the word out to Catholic newspapers all over the country to go after HEFLIN," and they have certainly carried out their instructions. All over the country they have had their papers attacking me and they have had mean and bitter magazine articles written about me, many of them since I opposed the Pope's program to use the United States Army to restore the Roman Catholic Church to power in Mexico. They have paid out a lot of money to carry on their attacks upon me. They know that I am an American and that they can not control me like they do control some half-hammered, weak-kneed Protestants in public station who are unworthy of the name of Protestant. It is time our people were getting their eyes open and apprising themselves of what is going on.

I saw a newspaper statement the other day where a very clever southern gentleman who is not a Catholic, but whose brother is a Catholic, which said, "Al Smith must be nominated now because the religious question has been raised." How ridiculous! The fact is Roman Catholics raised the religious question. They raised it at the Knights of Columbus convention at Philadelphia. The New York Times said in reporting that convention:

> The religious question as it affects the Catholic Church in Mexico was the main question before the convention.

That paper was their friend. I think the Catholics own it now. What did the Roman Catholic Bishop Daugherty say? He said, "Your action"—referring to the resolution of the Knights of Columbus—"seems to have aroused a dormant element in this country," referring to the Protestants in charge of the Government, "and shown them that they can not ignore and slight American Catholics." Who raised that question? It was done by the Roman Catholics.

Then, Mr. President, in the Democratic convention at New York what happened? The Roman Catholics brought in the question of denouncing the Ku-Klux Klan. I hold no brief for the klan, but I indorse a great many things it stands for. It has in it some of the noblest principles that were ever embodied in the doctrine of any secret order. Of course, they have done things, some of them, that I do not indorse, but I do indorse their efforts to build a strong American spirit here in the United States under the American flag. I indorse their effort to aid the foreigners who come here in becoming in deed and in truth real American citizens. I indorse their work in driving bolshevism and communism out of the communities where they are strong; and they have done it. Show me a place where the Ku-Klux Klan is strong in northern cities and I will show you where communists and bolshevists are being put out of business. Say what you please about them, but they are Americans to the core. Nobody but a Protestant can belong to that organization. To the Knights of Columbus order nobody but a Catholic can belong. I do not indorse anybody's attack upon the law-abiding Jew. That is one mistake that some klansmen in some States have made.

What did I see in the convention in New York? I saw Roman Catholic delegates in the corridors of the hotels noisily demanding that the Ku-Klux Klan be denounced by the Democratic convention. I talked to a number of them. I said, "Gentlemen, that question has got no business in this convention; you may not like the klan, but you have got no business trying to get a National Democratic Convention to denounce it. It is a Protestant order and Protestants generally think that you want it denounced because you are Catholics. What would you think if it sought to denounce the Knights of Columbus by the convention? Nobody but Catholics can join that order." "No," they replied, "we want the convention to denounce it." I said, "If you do, you will tear the Democratic Party to pieces," and a number of them replied, "To hell with the party if it will not denounce the klan." So I tell you Senators again that they put Roman Catholic government above everything, above the Democratic Party, and above their country. That is plain talk, but it is the plain truth.

What happened? They proceeded with their fight. In the committee room William Jennings Bryan—peace to his ashes, God rest his soul—struggled to keep that issue out of the convention. He and his friends defeated in the committee on platform and resolutions, and then they came out on the convention floor with it, and Roman Catholics who are prominent in their party demanded that the convention put their denunciation in the Democratic platform. Five thousand lawless hoodlums, Roman Catholics from Tammany, stood in the rear of the hall, and when one Roman Catholic official, a Senator, was speaking in favor of denouncing the klan they cheered him to the echo.

Then, when Mr. Bryan came out to try to prevent this threatened split in the party, to try to calm the element that sought to kill the hope of party success, what did they do? This bunch of Tammanyites hissed him and heckled him, and it was nearly 30 minutes before he could say a word. I with others, putting our hands up to our mouths in this fashion [illustrating], hollered to them to desist; that that was Mr. Bryan; to let him speak. An officious Roman Catholic official of some sort on the platform of the convention came up and put his hand on my shoulder and told me if I did not stop that noise he would have to put me out. Well, I wish Senators could have seen the situation. I told him, "If you do not get back where you belong, I will knock you off this platform." And he got back. That is the situation that we found there, when they were doing what? When as Roman Catholics—not as Americans, not as Democrats—they were demanding that a Democratic convention that had nothing on earth to do with the Ku-Klux fraternity, or any other fraternity, should damn it and denounce it in convention.

What happened? They called the roll and the proposition was defeated by four votes. Then they went to work from Saturday night until Monday morning to get some of the delegates to change their minds and reconsider the proposition and put it in the platform. I told some of the delegates from my State that if Alabama voted for that motion I would denounce the delegation over my signature in the State and go to the mat with them all. And the Alabama delegation did not go with them to reconsider the proposition.

Some Senators know about that. What next? John W. Davis—a very able, clever gentleman but the poorest politician that ever stood in front of a political army—permitted these gentlemen, not as Americans, not as Democrats, but as Roman Catholics, to insist that he denounce the Ku-Klux Klan and finish our chances of success at the polls after the convention had rejected that motion.

Then they sent word to Mr. Coolidge, so it is said, to join Mr. Davis in denouncing the klan. A bunch of priests called on him and told him Davis was going to denounce the klan, it is said, and that he had better denounce it, too, and they would eliminate that question as an issue.

Coolidge said he did not make a chatterbox out of his mouth about things that were not in the platform. [Laughter.] And he got elected, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] suggests. But what did John W. Davis do?

Mr. BLEASE. He got what he ought to have gotten; he got beaten.

Mr. HEFLIN. John W. Davis denounced it after this group of Catholics from Tammany, New York City, Al Smith's crowd, insisted that he denounce it, even after the great Democratic Party of the Nation had declined to take such action. Were they not putting the government of Rome above the Democratic Party then? Of course, they were; there is no other conclusion; and in an evil hour Davis denounced the klan and lost four States by that action.

Then what did they do? They owed him every vote they had; but they betrayed him. Another situation arose and they voted for Cal Coolidge, and gave Coolidge in the Democratic New York City nearly as big a majority as Al Smith got. Then talk about lecturing Democrats who say they could not support Al Smith as the nominee of the Democratic Party! If he is nominated he will not be the nominee of the Democratic Party, but he will be the nominee of the Roman Catholic party. We had just as well talk plainly about this thing. I am not going to fail my country and help anybody's insidious, false, and dangerous campaign. They helped to defeat Davis after he had done what they wanted done. They voted for Coolidge. Can Senators understand that? Coolidge refused to denounce the Klan. They were mad with him, of course, because he would not do it. Why did they vote for him?

Has our action in Nicaragua got anything to do with any of these things? We recall the friendly leanings of Mr. Kellogg in January last when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] nailed this issue to the cross. At that time the Secretary of State was wobbling, and it looked like we were about to get into war with Mexico, which is what they wanted. Did the understanding that they would see our Mexican policy changed have anything to do with their voting for Mr. Coolidge?

Diaz, a Roman Catholic, is an imposter and usurper in Nicaragua, filling the office of President, to which he has never been elected, and he holds sway over the dead bodies of natives who fought for self-government and home rule as our forefathers fought. Yet our soldiers with guns and bayonets are fighting to hold this man in the office of President. The Roman hierarchy is in control in Nicaragua, and priests are riding in the limousines of the Government; they are making frequent trips to the capital, and that crowd is in control. They have closed over half the public schools; they are taking the money appropriated for that purpose and turning it over to Roman Catholic priests. The soldiers of Diaz, Roman Catholics, are not in danger; they are not shedding any blood; they are sitting back while American boys, the sons of Protestant fathers and mothers are pursuing Sandino, a patriot, and we are killing the native stock who love liberty well enough to fight and die for it.

Will the Senate longer sit in silence and be treated as a rubber stamp by the President, who is conducting a one-man war in the name of the United States when Congress has never declared war? What are we here for Senators? Are we going to permit this situation to continue? I have a resolution before the Committee on Foreign Relations calling for the withdrawal of our troops from Nicaragua. I believe if the Senate and the House of Representatives were given a chance to consider that resolution they would vote to adopt it and bring our soldiers home.

What right have we to superintend an election in Nicaragua? When we first went there we were told it was to protect American life and property. Next we were told that it was to superintend an election in a foreign land; and next to kill the enemies of Diaz in their mountain fastnesses. My God, what are we coming to? Is the Senate losing its courage? Are we as individuals losing our courage? Are we afraid to speak out because the Roman Catholic hierarchy wants to control Nicaragua and get us in war with Mexico?

Let me tell you what is going to happen in Nicaragua. I have the inside information from a very reliable, brilliant American who has been down there.

Mexicans who know something about military science are training Nicaraguan natives; they are helping Sandino; they are enemies of Calles and they are going to surrender to our troops, it is said, in due time and say that Calles sent them down there to help fight the United States. A miserable plot and scandal! Those who would involve my name with a scandal and involve my honor and my integrity as a man and as a public servant are behind this scheme to pull this country into war with Mexico.

Did Senators read what Archbishop Curley said last night, speaking to 500 priests and prelates? He said that they were too timid; that they ought to come out more and press their Mexican cause. That is what he was talking about, and he said that he could not understand why we did not go there and clean up. Still trying to get us into war with Mexico.

What did the Pope say while Lindbergh was in Mexico? He said that he could not understand why the civilized government did not clean up Mexico.

What did the Catholic women of this Nation say by resolution right here in Washington while Lindbergh was there as an ambassador of good will? They called on this Government to be ashamed of what we are doing to continue cordial relations with this "red-handed murderer," Calles, and denounced him in all sorts of fashions and his government because of the treatment of nuns and priests and Catholic bishops. Are we going to war for the Catholic machine, for the Catholic Church?

Senators, I am astounded when I know what I do about these movements in the United States that more of us are not talking out in meeting. The situation ought to arouse the patriotism of every Senator and stir his blood so that he would get up and make himself felt.

Mr. President, in a remark to his aid, Capt. Archie Butt, recorded by him in a letter to his mother, published in the New York Herald-Tribune in 1924, Roosevelt said:

> The Roman Catholic Church is in no way suited to this country and can never have any great permanent growth, except through immigration, for its thought is Latin, and entirely at variance with the dominant thought of our country and its institutions.

Then Mr. Roosevelt tells about when he was in Rome, and, of course, they expected him, the ex-President, to call on the Pope, and they sent him word that he could not call if he visited a certain Protestant mission there. Roosevelt was an American. He did not bow the knee to the Roman Catholic hierarchy or the Government of Rome. He declined to let them tell him where he could go or could not go, and he did not call on the Pope.

The great Frenchman, Lafayette, said that if this Government ever lost its liberty it would be by priests and nuns.

Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, said:

> As to the public schools, everybody knows where Romanism stands. It is waging relentless warfare against the free, nonsectarian school, its purpose being to put the children in the power of the nuns and priests.

That is in keeping with what Lafayette said.

> Wherever Rome has ruled she has left the people sunk in ignorance. Never has she encouraged the laity to study the Bible. In every possible way she has striven to make learning a sealed book to the masses, compelling them to look to the priest for guidance.

Is not that true? What about Mexico; and why do they hate the very ground the President of Mexico walks on? Because he has had the courage to beard the Roman lion in his den and tell him and the world the truth. He said:

> For 400 years you cursed my poor country. Every insurrection, every revolution, all the trouble we have had can be traced to your meddling with government in Mexico.

Then they talk about expelling priests and not expelling Protestant ministers from Mexico. Do you know why? Every Protestant preacher in the service is a native, and these foreign-trained priests are sent there, and I think they have done right to keep them out. That is why they are expelling them. They are willing for the Catholics to have native priests, but foreign priests have kept the masses of Mexico ignorant so long that it is hard to find one competent enough to do the job as they want it done.

Mr. President, Premier Edward Herriot, of France, throughout his tenure of office labored to free the public schools of France and the newly regained Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine from the blight of priestcraft.

On January 23, 1925, Premier Herriot demanded that France sever all relations with the Vatican, saying:

> Rome must cease its attempts to make of Catholicism a political party in France.

God knows they have already made one of it here in the United States. When I was speaking around last summer, and I predicted that Al Smith would not be nominated, the papers of Boston quoted Jim Curley, who used to be in Congress from there and has since been made mayor of Boston, a Roman Catholic. He said if Al Smith was not nominated they would form a Catholic party, and I said, "Mr. Curley is a quarter of a century behind. They have already formed a Roman Catholic party." There are three distinct political parties in this country to-day—the Democratic Party, the Republican Party, and the Roman Catholic Party.

Again, Mr. Herriot said—listen:

> Rome is trying to constitute Catholic parties everywhere. * * *
> The Pope has congratulated the Catholics for having organized in France. This is intervention in French internal affairs. The Pope should have remained politically neutral.

On September 10, 1924, I saw a dispatch from Rome, from the Pope, in which he said it was not only his right but his duty to advise Catholics how to vote.

Continuing, Mr. Herriot said:

There is one policy—the policy of liberty and independence from the Vatican. Every nation is free, and we do not have to receive orders from the Pope.

That is the Premier of France talking. I do not remember whether he is a Catholic or not, but he is a high officer in a Catholic country, and he is sound in what he said.

Up in Rhode Island last summer the Catholic bishops had collected from some of the French Catholics $3,000,000. The Frenchman is a man of an inquiring mind, and some of them wanted to know of the bishops what had been done with that $3,000,000. They declined to tell. They went into court to have them account for that $3,000,000; and they took the case to the Pope of Rome, or to the college of cardinals, and they denounced these French Catholics. The last I saw of it they were threatening to excommunicate them, which means send their souls to hell, for daring to go into a court created by this Government about matters arising among citizens of this Government. The conduct of the Catholic bishops showed beyond question their allegiance to another government above this Government, and that was the Roman Catholic government.

Is there any escape from that conclusion? What was it that General Grant, the friend of the public school, said on this subject?

The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free nation! If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's; but between patriotism and intelligence on one side, and superstition and ambition on the other! Now, in this centennial year of our national existence, I believe it is a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the house commenced by our forefathers 100 years ago, at Concord and Lexington.

Encourage free schools and resolve that not one dollar of money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to any sectarian school.

I am told that they appropriate money in New York for a certain sectarian school.

Now, let me bring to your attention something that has never been brought to light.

When Senator Bard, a Republican of California, was a Member of this body, a Roman Catholic Knight of Columbus, Doctor Scharf, of this city, went to him and made him a proposition that if the Congress would appropriate $200,000 for two years to Catholic schools they would throw the Catholic vote in 20 close congressional districts to the Republican candidates, and make sure of carrying the House by the Republicans. I have the testimony here—Senator Bard's testimony. He said Doctor Scharf brought him a letter from a Roman Catholic bishop named Montgomery; they were all in the scheme, and Scharf represented the Catholic Church, and the church was ready to have Democratic Catholics vote the Republican ticket in 20 districts named if they would give, out of the Treasury of the United States, $200,000 a year to Catholic schools for two years, making $400,000. Senator Bard, an honest man, told the committee what had occurred, and prevented this awful steal and deal from going through.

I am showing you that they put the Roman machine above the Democratic Party, above the Government, and above everything; and the sooner the American people find it out the better it will be for free institutions in America.

I would, if I could, reach the hearts of the Catholics who are patriotic, and tell them to draw back from the abyss to which some of their imported thick-headed priests are leading them. They are going to bring trouble, I fear. The patriotic people of the United States do not like this brazen boldness and arrogant opposition to the public-school system, free speech, peaceful assembly, and restricted immigration. Let me cite you to another instance where they put the Catholic régime first. Lindbergh, a Mason, the "Lone Eagle," as fine a type of American manhood as ever walked the earth, came back from Paris, and they gave him a big ovation in New York. Now, why should they have provided that he had to be stopped on that parade and required to go out into the square where a Catholic cardinal sat like a king on his throne and do obeisance to him, and shake hands and greet him, while the paraders halted in the street? That was not a Catholic occasion; it was an American occasion, when all Americans of all creeds should have honored him. They ought to have had Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and all denominations out to do him honor. But they did not do it. Protestant preachers were in the background. Protestant people as such were pushed aside, and this great parade was halted, Lindbergh was escorted out, Governor Smith in front kissed the cardinal's ring. Mayor Walker next kissed the cardinal's ring, and of course it was supposed that Lindbergh would kiss the cardinal's ring; but he did not do it. He reached out that long arm and caught the cardinal by the hand and said, "How are you?"

That is the American way of doing it. He did not fall into the trap. He remembered his own Protestantism and his good father's and mother's Protestantism and Americanism.

I served in the House with Congressman Lindbergh, this young man's father.

In 1916 Lindbergh's father introduced in the House a resolution calling for an investigation of the Roman Catholic convents and the general activities of the political machine of the Roman Catholic Church. He set out, in section 7 of that resolution, that the Roman Catholics were seeking to involve us in war with Mexico. He said they were trying to destroy our public schools, free speech, free press; and yet they take his son—no doubt some of them had in mind that he might kiss that ring—and they bring him and bow his strong American back to the customs of paganism and superstition—kissing the cardinal's ring. Thank God, he stood up, with head erect, and American light upon his face, and refused to do it.

Did you know they introduced a bill in the Legislature of New York a few years back seeking to repeal the law which makes it a penalty to impersonate Christ? The purpose of it was to give them permission to allow a Catholic priest to impersonate Him in the Passion Play for the moving pictures of the country. All the States have laws forbidding any person impersonating Christ, and it is a good law. The legislature defeated the Catholic bill to permit a Catholic priest to impersonate Christ in a play in a theater in New York.

Did you know that they introduced in the New York Legislature a bill providing a penalty for anyone who represented a school-teacher seeking a school in the various communities in the State of New York if such representative dared to tell the people of the religious belief of the applicant for the school? They did, and I have seen a copy of it. I have it somewhere.

A gentleman in Albany sent it to me. What was the purpose of that? At the hearing before a legislative committee it was disclosed that the Knights of Columbus said that out in the State the Protestants were prejudiced against having Roman Catholic teachers, and if told the applicants were Roman Catholics they did not want them to teach Protestant children, and they were seeking to use the power of the New York Legislature to prevent Protestant people from knowing the religious belief of those who were to teach their children. This was done, it was claimed, to enable Catholic teachers to get into schools without the people knowing what religious belief they had.

What right have they to keep Protestant parents from knowing who is to teach their children? They have a right to know. The Roman Catholic parochial school teaches the unity of church and state. The Roman Catholic parochial school teaches that the Pope is the ruler of all lands, the Vicar of Christ, and God himself in the flesh.

The Roman Catholic machine is against a free press, it is against free speech. It has shown it on many occasions. On my rounds in speaking to the American people last year I found certain Catholics violating practically every principle of the first amendment to the Constitution. Talk about infringing free speech! They tried to keep my speeches from reaching the American people through the press. They tried to prevent those who wanted to hear me tell about the efforts made to involve us in war with Mexico from having a hall for that purpose. So they tried to deny them their constitutional right of peaceful assembly. They tried to prevent local newspapers from publishing notices of my speaking dates. So they interfered with the free press. And yet when you expose their un-American activities they squirm with a look of injured innocence on their faces and say, "They are intolerant; they are bigoted." The unfortunate thing is that they frequently induce half-asleep, half-hammered Protestants to stand up and make their speeches for them about intolerance, and they just sit back and laugh amongst themselves and say, "It went over all right. He never has known the job that we have put over on him." I will tell you what he is doing. As surely as God reigns he is helping them pave the way for the overthrow of free institutions in America.

I want to read you something that will open the eyes of the American people unless they are already blind. I want every Senator to hear this. Here is a wide-awake and truly great American. Brilliant, courageous, and eloquent; who has spoken things that this Nation needs to know. I refer to Doctor McDaniel, president of the Southern Baptist convention. I repeat he has proclaimed some important truths to his countrymen. Here is what he said:

"Rome never changes" is the proud boast of Roman Catholics. Wherever she has had the power she has suppressed dissenting opinion. Intolerance and persecution are marks of her identity through the centuries. To-day she is doing the same as in the years when freedom was in her chains.

In this good year of our Lord the bishop on the Island of Malorca in the Mediterranean led a procession of the mayor, town council, school children, and citizenry to the public square and burned several books which the people had been reading.

In Italy there appears to be an alignment between fascism and Romanism. Freemasonry was the first object of attack. Lodges were destroyed, their records burned, and Masons by the hundreds imprisoned or killed. Non-Roman Catholic denominations were the second to feel the hand of intolerance. Their churches were ordered to close all evening schools, for the order reads, "the matter of teaching, both spiritual and physical, is a delicate one and should be intrusted to the state and its church." A church building near Naples was burned to the ground, and the members were severely beaten.

And yet Roman Catholics here have the gall to talk about us interfering with an armed force in Mexico, when right under the Pope's eye in Rome they are killing Protestants who demand the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

But let me read to you from the great message of Doctor McDaniel, of Virginia:

The press was the third to fall under the proscriptive ban. Non-Catholic papers were first forbidden to print anything contrary to Romanism. Then, on June 30, the American daily papers carried a news item from Rome under the heading, "Freedom of Italian press is curtailed drastically," virtually no foreign news may be printed. The order grossly violates every principle of the freedom of the press.

In the United States, where Catholocism is not in the ascendency, Roman Catholics have their secret societies, their houses of worship, and their religious press, and all under the protection of law. I would contend for such protection if it were not already theirs. In Italy, the seat of the Papacy, where the Roman Catholic Church is recognized by the Dictator Mussolini as "the state's church," Masonic lodges are forbidden, dissenting congregations are broken up, denominational papers are censored, and freedom of the press is denied. The Pope could remedy these wrongs in a day if he would, but he is silent. Roman Catholics of the United States doubtless could be influential and instrumental in securing for non-Catholics in Italy the rights that Catholics enjoy in the United States, but they are silent. One is constrained to inquire: If the Pope and Roman Catholics had the power in the United States that they have in Italy, would they be as intolerant here as they are there? Judged by every historical precedent, they would.

Judge Alfred J. Talley, chairman of the committee on Catholic interests of the Catholic Club of New York, has the effrontery to demand that the Government of the United States withdraw recognition of the Government of Mexico and "brand her as an outlaw," but neither he nor the Catholic Club takes any notice of the outrages visited upon non-Catholics in Italy. It depends on whose ox is gored. He can see the "persecution" of Romanists in Mexico, but is blind to the persecution of Masons and non-Catholics in Italy. He is afflicted with hyperopia.

Mr. President, if George Washington were alive to-day and in Italy, they would strip him of his Masonic paraphernalia and deny him the right to meet with his Masonic brethren in a lodge in Italy. Roman Catholics have recently murdered at Florence, Italy, in one night, 137 Masons, and only 10 of those deaths were ever announced in the press of the United States. Catholic newspapers and Catholic-controlled newspapers will not tell the truth about these things to the people of the United States. My friends, they are interfering with the press. They will not let such facts be known. They do not want us to know of the cruelties and crimes of certain Roman Catholics in countries where they are in power. They want to keep us in the dark.

Continuing, Doctor McDaniel said:

The United States is the country most coveted by the Papacy.

When the time came to organize the Colonies into a nation it was Anglo-Saxons who did it. All spoke the same language. All, except a few descendants of Dutch and Swedes in New York and Delaware, some Germans in Pennsylvania, some children of French Huguenots in New England and the Middle States belonging to the same race. Mr. Bryce aptly says: "All except some Roman Catholics in Maryland professed the Protestant religion." Being of one language, one race, and one religion, they organized the freest Government on earth. Here all languages are spoken, all races reside, and all religions are protected. It would be the irony of fate if, after this Nation has grown great by a policy of liberalism toward all, a Latin-speaking religion, made strong by immigration, should take advantage of our liberal laws to shelter and strengthen itself until it stole away our liberty and subtly bound us with the fetters of Romanism. One of our most perplexing tasks is so to guide the affairs of this Nation as to prevent this catastrophe, and at the same time see that equal justice is meted out to all citizens and religions.

ANOTHER STATEMENT FROM DOCTOR M'DANIEL

No religion, however, must use American freedom as a cloak to cover itself until it grows strong enough to cast the cloak away and thus disclose its own selfish and tyrannical character.

I commend that to the thoughtful consideration of every American who loves his country. This man has told the truth. He knows what is going on more than a great many Senators or Members of the House know; more than the American people generally know; but thank God they are getting their eyes open.

Let me read to you now the declared purpose of certain Roman Catholics, high in authority, to destroy Protestantism by force in America. Listen to Bishop Cannon. I have read to you from a message from a great Protestant—a Baptist. This one is from a great Methodist bishop, Bishop Cannon. He is in entire agreement with Doctor McDaniel, president of the Southern Baptist convention. He said that where the Catholics are in the minority they are very courteous and tolerant, but where they get to be in the majority they are very bold, aggressive, tyrannical, and intolerant; and that is true. Listen to his statement:

As a proof of the real position of Romanism, quotations are given from a very recent book entitled "The State and the Church," published by Dr. John A. Ryan, professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America, and Father Miller, of the Jesuit Society, printed and copyrighted by the National Catholic Welfare Council in 1924.

Listen to this on page 32; we read:

Pope Leo XIII declares that the state must not only have care for religion but recognize the true religion. This means the form of religion professed by the Catholic Church. It is a thoroughly logical position. If the state is under moral compulsion to profess and promote religion, it is obviously obliged to profess and promote only the religion that is true, for no individual, no group of individuals, no society, no state is justified in supporting error or in according to error the same recognition as to truth.

Again it is declared:

But constitutions can be changed, and non-Catholic sects may decline to such a point that the political proscription of them may become feasible and expedient.

Mr. President, there is the Roman Catholic threat that whenever they get the power they will tell us here as they are telling them in Italy, "close that Baptist Church and that Methodist Church, Presbyterian, and so on. This is a Catholic country and you can not carry on your religious program here against the Roman Catholic Church." Here they are declaring it in the books written and circulated by the leading writers of the Roman Catholic Church.

Listen to this astounding statement in this Roman Catholic book:

What protection would they then have against the Catholic state?

God deliver my country from that day. They are telling us that when the time comes they will suppress Protestantism, they will force people to submit to their way of thinking, and they say, "What chance would they have against the power of the Catholic state?" In view of these threatening things, with so many Protestants asleep, I tremble for the safety of my country. Let me read that again:

What protection would they [the Protestants] then have against the Catholic state?

What protection have these Masons now in Italy? Lodges torn down, books and records burned, Masons imprisoned, 137 murdered in a night, and the grand master of the Masons of Italy sent off to prison for five years. Not a word from the Catholic power in the United States nor from that power in Italy. Then talk about being intolerant!

Listen to this statement from the same Catholic book:

The latter could logically tolerate only such religious activities as were confined to the members of the dissenting group. It could not permit them to carry on the general propaganda.

What does that mean? You could not send your missionaries abroad. You could not hold meetings in your churches and preach the gospel as Christ would have you preach it. You could not go around and have family prayer with the sick ones in the home. What a horrible doctrine to announce in these United States.

Then Bishop Cannon said:

Here is set forth openly and boldly the Romish doctrine of the right, even the duty, of the Romish Church wherever it has the numbers and the power to prohibit the carrying on of religious activities—"propaganda" by the smaller bodies. In this language is found the seed of every form of Romish intolerance, including the un-Christian, cruel, devilish inquisition.

Mr. President, in the name of all that is dear to us as a free people I call on my countrymen to wake up. The climax of this move is Al Smith's candidacy for President. Wake up, Americans! Gird your loins for political battle, the like of which you have not seen in all the tide of time in this country. Get ready for this battle. The Roman Catholics of every country on the earth are backing his campaign. Already they are spending money in the South buying up newspapers, seeking to control the vehicles that carry the news to the people. They are sending writers down there from New York and other places to misrepresent and slander our State, all this to build a foundation on which to work for Al Smith for President. The Roman Catholic edict has gone forth in secret articles, "Al Smith is to be made President." Doctor McDaniel said: "Of all countries the Pope wants to control this country." "The Knights of Columbus slogan," said Doctor Chapman, M. A. C., "is make America Catholic." Here they tell you in their book that they will force the propaganda of Protestants to cease, they will lay the heavy hand of a Catholic state upon you and crush the life out of Protestantism in America.

Oh, Martin Luther, great father of the Protestant reformation!. The greatest event in religious history except the coming of Christ was when Martin Luther, when a Roman Catholic priest, heard God speaking to him from His throne on high to throw off the robes and habiliments of superstition, paganism, and the man-made creed of Plato, which is found in a book recently published called the "History of Philosophy." The great Luther arose and thundered the doctrine of the Bible, that "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the water of life freely," and that every man and every woman may bow down and worship God according to the dictates of their conscience." That is the essence of religious freedom. All hail to Martin Luther!

Under his doctrine no human being can be forced to belong to any particular church. You could not compel anyone to go up and kneel down and confess to a priest through a hole in a door. They could address their petitions directly to God, the Father of us all. That was Luther's doctrine. Confess your sins to Him, address Him represented by His Son, who went about doing good, who restored sight to the blind, made the lame to walk, and brought life to the dead. This was the Master who walked the dusty highways of Judea, preaching the gospel of democracy unto the least of these, my brethren. That was Martin Luther, who barely escaped with his life from Catholics who sought to kill him.

They sent for John Huss, another one who loved religious freedom well enough to die for it, who threw off the Roman Catholic shackles. They sent for him and promised him on their honor that they would guard and protect him. They wanted to hear his side, they said. They murdered him, burned him at the stake. They broke their vow to him. They trampled their honor in the dust, if they had any, and burned this Christian martyr at the stake. They did the same thing to Savonarola. They promised him protection, broke faith with him, and burned him at the stake. They sent for Luther, and Luther had a guard that would not desert him. They could not in any way frighten his guard and make them afraid. They had become thoroughly imbued with the doctrine of Luther, and they were ready to die for him. They tried to burn Luther at the stake, and when his friends got him away they had to place a strong guard about his home two years to keep the Roman Catholics from murdering him. There again is a fine sample of their tolerance.

The inquisition, one of the most deadly things in all history. The enemies of the Roman Catholics were thrown in prison and held there for years and years because they would not accept the Roman Catholic religion. Napoleon, when he swept with his brave legions into Spain and Italy, struck the shackles from the limbs of white-haired old prisoners who had been incarcerated for 30 or 40 years. They had strangled others to death and burned others at the stake—the Roman Catholics' Spanish Inquisition.

In France on St. Bartholomew's Day—of cursed memory—at midnight the signal for the slaughter of Protestants was given by ringing the bell in a Roman Catholic Church tower. Roman Catholics went forth with their implements of murder and killed men, women, and children—60,000 of them. Pope Gregory V issued a medal to be worn by those who had murdered 60,000 Protestants—the enemies of the Catholic Church, and the King ordered bonfires lighted throughout the country in honor of those who had murdered the enemies of the Roman Catholic Church.

The spirit that prompted that malice, violence, and murder is the same spirit in a different form that connected my name with this Hearst-Mexican-Catholic scandal. It is that devilish spirit that has always manifested itself when they felt that they were growing in power and were going to get control of the country.

God deliver this Nation from the rule of Al Smith and all that that means to this country. Go look at the corrupt record of Tammany and hang your heads in shame. Pillage and plunder and graft, a Roman Catholic political machine. Al Smith now its candidate for President of these United States. Tammany, denounced by Cleveland and Wilson and all the great leaders of the party. Tammany now comes forth with a soaking wet Tammanyite, a nullifyer of the Constitution and a Roman Catholic for President of the United States. I warn my party against nominating him. If they put the nomination of my party on him the Republicans can and will defeat him by from fifteen to twenty million votes.

The American people, with their knowledge of what this political machine of the Roman Catholic Church is doing, are not going to turn this Government over to it just now, and I do not blame them. Would you want Al Smith in the White House with Diaz, the Roman Catholic, running for President in Nicaragua, and our soldiers kept down there constantly baptizing the soil with the blood of the natives and killing American boys to help a Roman Catholic get elected to the office of President there? Would you want this Roman Catholic wet in the White House, with the Mexican situation as it is? Do you recall that the Roman Catholic women of America have just recently urged the President of the United States to interfere in Mexico? Archbishop Curley just last night scolding because we are not doing something, with the Knights of Columbus at Philadelphia demanding that something be done, and the resolution from a Roman Catholic Congressman from New York demanding that we sever diplomatic relations with Mexico, and Catholic organizations doing the same thing, all on account, they say, of the persecution of Catholics and the effort to destroy the Catholic Church in Mexico? Would you want to put Al Smith in charge of this Government with the power to appoint a Secretary of State and an Ambassador to Mexico at this particular time? I, for one, do not want to do that. If you are the right kind of Americans, you do not want to do it.

I am sounding this note in time. I want the country to know that it is to the highest and best interests of the Nation to defeat Al Smith's nomination. He ought not to be nominated. In my judgment, he is not going to be nominated. Every Senator in the South who supports him will never come back to this Capitol. The real Democratic Party is entitled to consideration. I have seen that party in the South—God bless that section—when the fires of the Democratic Party had gone out in the East, the North, and the West, not a Democratic governor in any of them. The South stood alone, carrying the torch of the party and bearing aloft the ark of the covenant of the Democrats of the United States. The South—God bless her—no cloud of scandal hangs on her horizon, no act of dishonor darkens her name.

And now they tell us that if we do not nominate Al Smith they will quit the party. Let them quit the party. They have done it many times before. They did it in 1916 and did their best to beat Wilson because he would not go to war with Mexico for the Roman Catholic Church. They did it in 1924 because there was some sort of understanding, I do not know just what yet, with the Republican leaders. One thing certain they did not vote for Davis. They threw down the Democratic nominee. In fact, Al Smith has no right to run in the Democratic primary. They who constitute the Roman Catholic political machine in New York are not Democratic. Let that bunch support one Democrat for President before they offer somebody for the nomination. Let Americans stand together and strive to preserve free institutions in America. Let Roman Catholic laymen show the priests and prelates that they put the American Government above everything. I am going to introduce a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution to deport every man found in the United States who holds a double allegiance—one to this country and one to the Catholic Government at Rome.

If he can not swear before God with his hand on his heart, that he holds allegiance to this flag, the Stars and Stripes, and to this flag only, I want him deported. There is no place in the United States for a man who holds secret allegiance to a foreign country. I do not want any double allegiance; secret allegiance to the Pope of Rome, and some sort of manifested allegiance to this country, which is frequently brushed aside whenever Catholic occasion requires, is not a wholesome thing for our country.

I have a picture on my desk of the United States flag pulled down on the battleship Cincinnati. I cut it out of the Washington Post. The Roman Catholic flag is above it. Under it, it is said, "This is the only flag that flies above the United States flag." It is Sunday and they are having service. I want that order changed. I do not want to see the Roman Catholic flag or any Protestant flag above the American flag. They can hang their signs somewhere else.

When I saw that flag there I said, "That represents the spirit of 'Rome first.'" Let the United States flag always be first and on top. I resent the putting of the Catholic flag above the United States flag. I want a law that will deport persons of double allegiance, those who are playing a double-handed game. I do not want the time to come that Doctor McDaniel speaks of when they have grown so strong under the wings of our liberalism that they will come out and crush Protestantism and Americanism in the United States.

Do Senators remember when I spoke here last spring that I read about the Protestant movement in England to combat the efforts of the Roman Catholics to change the Protestant prayer book? Do they remember that I read where Protestants were getting up petitions against it? Well, the prediction I made has come to pass. The Catholic crowd submitted the change to the Parliament. The House of Lords adopted it, but the House of Commons defeated it. Listen! The only paper in America that recorded it of which I know was the Washington Star. I have had occasion to criticize that newspaper; I criticize it when I think it deserves it; but I also praise it when it deserves it. I praise that newspaper for publishing that statement. Here is what that newspaper said when the House of Commons defeated the proposition to change the prayer book, "The applause was deafening in the galleries; the Protestants were rejoicing that they had defeated the Roman Catholic move to Catholicize the prayer book of England." Now, you see they have grown bold enough in England to make that fight and it has gone to Parliament. The House of Lords surrendered to the Roman Catholics, but the House of Commons sustained the Protestant cause. They are moving upon England, the mother country.

The Catholic machine has already struck down free speech, peaceful assembly, and a free press in Italy. They are murdering men who belong to the secret order of Washington—Freemasonry—and yet we are permitting the Knights of Columbus to flourish and to threaten our public assemblies in the United States when we dare to speak about things that they do not want us to speak about.

Mr. President, let me say just a further word. It is impossible to cover this important subject in one speech. I want to read from Mussolini's own hand:

> The soul of Italy must be purified and it devolves on me to fill the assignment. * * * The liberty of the press, individual freedom, freedom of thought, all such vagaries must go.

That is the way Italy is to be saved. Right here in the United States we are permitting dangerous secret orders to be formed—the fascists—and I will discuss them in due time—and a Roman Catholic secret order flourishing right here in the United States, started in the State of New York. Governor Smith has never opened his mouth against it, but it is ten thousand times more deadly to American institutions than any Ku-Klux Klan or anything like it could ever be, with the head of it—Mussolini—in Italy.

Do Senators here realize that most Americans are asleep and that Catholic orders are putting things over all around us? But a few public men can be found to open their mouths and state the truth about them. Should a public man do so they go to him and threaten him and he has got to defy them or apologize and promise them he will never say anything else. I know of the Governor of a State who told a joke that they thought reflected on some nuns; he was just innocently repeating it. They called on him and they liked to have scared the wits out of him. He apologized; he has never told a story on them since, and has become one of the most subservient tools they have.

If ever anything is said about them in a newspaper locally, they just go quietly to the person running the newspaper and say "If that ever occurs any more we will stop our subscriptions," and you will never see anything more in that paper, as a rule. Now and then you find an American editor who will go out and tell his friends about the threat and they tell him to stand by his convictions, that they will stand by him.

This Roman Catholic political machine works in politics; and meddles with men's business. They have more people in the Government departments here at Washington than they are entitled to. Do you know, Senators, that they had a forged note about Mexico which disturbed the State Department? Do they remember that in April last? We were almost brought to the verge of war. There was an insulting note written to Calles and an insulting note written to this Government; and both countries stood wondering why such a note was written. Those notes were both forged. Seventy per cent, I am informed, of the employees of the State Department are Roman Catholics. I have read here a letter from a gentleman who said that these papers were stolen out of there last year.

Let us investigate these things and find out just where we are. If we are all real Americans, let us by all means be Americans first, not Methodists first or Baptists first or Roman Catholics first, but Americans first. Let the Catholics strip themselves of this Roman Catholic political machine that "buts in" on politics as Catholics and come out in the open like other citizens and stand up like Americans, not sensitive when somebody tells the truth on them, as I have told it here to-day.

They can not deny that the Knights of Columbus resolution to get us in war was passed at Philadelphia; they can not deny that a resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. BOYLAN, a Roman Catholic, to sever diplomatic relations with Mexico; they can not dispute their efforts in Nicaragua to get us into war with Mexico through Nicaragua, and I am just as certain that they had a hand in this conspiracy against me and the Senators from Idaho, Wisconsin, and Nebraska as that I live and God reigns. That was the climax of an effort to silence me and them and to destroy our influence; probably to intimidate us into silence. I want to assert again, in conclusion, that I will not be cowed or intimidated by their efforts and by the mean, scandalous, lying, thieving acts they have committed toward me.

There is no amount of money that I would have accepted to have had my name even associated with it; but when they were unable to keep me from speaking in this body—and they tried to do that—when they were unable to keep me from reaching the people—and they tried to do that in order to prevent them having the truth—and when they sought to keep the Post Office Department from letting the people get my speeches from the Government when they paid for them—and they tried to do that and then charged me with selling my speeches to "customers"—they were lying and doing an un-American thing. That bunch of priests in Buffalo, N. Y., priests in charge of that newspaper—hierarchs of the church—every one of them knew when they wrote that that they were liars in the sight of God, and they are; daring to bring their infamous attacks into the sacred precincts of this Chamber to attack the name and the honor of an American Senator who will not bow the knee to the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

There ought to be some way to punish them as well as to punish Hearst—and we are not through with him yet. Probably the greatest punishment that could come to him would be to make him pay heavy damages for the wrong and the harm he has done. He probably would not feel any other kind of punishment; a man who, because of property in Mexico, because his wife is a Catholic, and because of his connections with the Roman Catholic crowd, would permit himself to be used to drag the names of four Senators of his own country into shame and scandal like this is not worthy of the respect of decent American citizens nor are those who inspired this attack, who got this Mexican half-breed Avila—and a lower skunk and scoundrel never breathed; half Mexican and half Italian, Roman Catholic on both sides, a hydra-headed Roman Catholic monster, the tool used to lug my name and three other Senators into such a scandal as this.

Mr. President, in the name of all that I hold dear as an American and in the name of the good mother who bore me and my good father who has gone to his reward, and my dear wife who has gone on to heaven, I reconsecrate myself to the service of my country. I will continue to expose and attack un-American conduct wherever I find it and do all in my power to keep them from carrying that flag and American boys to fight in Mexico or elsewhere for the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I take the floor to make a very brief statement with reference to some of the inferences and some of the express declarations made by the Senator from Alabama in the address that he has just concluded in this Chamber.

There is not here a Member who does not believe that the Senator from Alabama and the other Senators to whom he has made reference, whose names were coupled with his in certain published documents that have been the subject matter of investigation by the committee of the Senate, are entirely free from any express or implied suspicion as to corrupt practices or motives. The special committee of the Senate recently made a partial report to that effect. The Senate committee investigating the documents has been unable to identify the person or persons responsible for the forgeries; and no testimony which the committee feels reflects light upon the subject discloses the motives prompting the forgeries.

I consider it my duty to say that, whatever may have been the motive of Mr. Hearst in publishing the documents, I think it unworthy of the Senator from Alabama to declare that the fact, if it be a fact, that Mrs. Hearst is a Catholic is in any way responsible for the publication of these documents.

I hold no brief for Mr. Hearst. It is true that there naturally arises in the mind of every person the inquiry as to who committed the great offense against these worthy Senators and also what was the motive that prompted that infamous conduct; but there is, sir, in my judgment, not one word of testimony in the entire record taken by the special committee of the Senate that justifies the inference asserted by the Senator from Alabama that the Catholic Church or Catholic agencies inspired or prompted the forgeries for the purpose of humiliating or disgracing him or for any other purpose.

It may be that in the future, in the prosecution of its labors, the committee will be able to ascertain or to identify the guilty parties; and it may be that upon the disclosure as to who forged these documents some implication may arise as to the motive prompting the misconduct.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. So far as I am concerned, I am going to object to the Senator from Arkansas remaining on that committee any longer. He feels called on to try to answer my speech to-day and go out of his way since somebody has come down there and had a conversation with him; and I am going to object to the Senator from Arkansas remaining on the committee any longer. I do not think he is fair to me, and as a representative of the Democratic Party I repudiate his speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama can, of course, take any course about the matter that he chooses to take, and the Senate can take any course about the matter that it desires to take; and the Senate would relieve me from a very arduous and embarrassing duty if it saw fit to supply my place with another Senator in whom it has greater confidence.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall ask that that course be taken.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. The Senator from Alabama can do that now, or at any other time that he desires to do it.

Mr. President, I am making this statement from a sense of fairness and justice. I have served in the Senate a good many years, and I have enjoyed an intimate friendship with the Senator from Alabama. I feel that I have a duty to perform on this occasion. I may be wrong about it; the Senator from Alabama may be correct; but I do not believe there is a member of this committee who does not in his conscience justify my declaration that the inference, asserted over and over again by the Senator from Alabama, that the Catholic Church and the Knights of Columbus forged or inspired the forgery of these documents to injure him, is unjust and unwarranted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, of course.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was chairman of that committee, and I want to say that for myself I agree with every word the Senator from Arkansas is saying. There was not one syllable of evidence that anything in the case was inspired by any religious sect or any religious group whatsoever.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I rise merely for the purpose of saying that I entertain precisely the same conclusions with respect to that matter that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Pennsylvania do. It so happens that I, also, am a member of that committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right there——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Maryland took the same position upon this question when I discussed it here last spring. I did not think that he would do me any injustice when I consented for him to go on this committee, and I am still willing for him to remain on it until we can reorganize.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] had just finished a fight with me and others the day he was appointed on the committee. I had opposed the seating of his man VARE from Pennsylvania; and, really, the member of that committee whom I would regard straight out as my friend would have been the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

The Senator from Arkansas had something to say here last spring on this question. He felt called on then to say something, and he did. He has gone further to-day than he did then. I discussed part of the testimony and then read letters from people all over the country saying that the Roman Catholics were doing this or the Knights of Columbus, and read excerpts from Catholic papers. The Senator feels called on to get up here now and try to lecture me; and I want the matter considered when this is over, because we are going to draw the line here. I am going to insist on it. The Senator from Arkansas can not remain leader of the Democrats and fight the Roman Catholics' battle every time the issue is raised in this body without some expression from a constitutional Democrat.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, whenever the Senator from Alabama can determine who shall be the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate of the United States, that party can get somebody else than myself to lead it here.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, you have my consent to do that now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. President, it is an amazing demonstration by the Senator from Alabama, who thinks there is a personal affront in the declaration that I have made, supported by every member of the special committee who is present, that in our judgment the record does not justify the inference drawn by the Senator from Alabama that the Catholic Church or its agents prompted the forging of the documents.

Mr. HEFLIN. And I never said in my speech that they did. I showed what happened in the committee, and read these letters and these newspaper articles, and then made my speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, Mr. President, I think throughout the speech of the Senator from Alabama and at its very conclusion he made that assertion in forceful language. I do not think my memory can be mistaken, and I am going to ask the Senator from Alabama now not to do what he is in the habit of doing—revise his remarks to such an extent that they are not recognizable after he speaks here.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, that is not true. That is not true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama had better not interrupt me.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I will say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say that the statement is not true that I correct my speeches so that they are not recognizable. I correct them as every other Senator does if I am interrupted, speaking offhand. I correct them; and it is my right to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but I repeat, Mr. President, that in the presence of all the Senate and of this audience the Senator from Alabama over and over said to-day that he believed that the Catholic Church and the Knights of Columbus and other agencies associated with the Catholic Church were responsible for connecting his name with these documents.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did; and I repeat that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. I say that the record of the testimony which the committee took does not justify that inference or declaration, and, in my judgment, the Senator from Alabama is without justification to take offense at that statement.

I am performing what I believe to be a duty. I have not raised any question as to the Senator's right to say or to do anything that he thinks he is justified in doing in connection with this subject or this controversy.

With peculiarly bad taste, without justification in the conscience of a single one of his colleagues, either on this side of the Chamber or on the other, the Senator from Alabama has lugged into this debate the names of prospective presidential candidates. The Senate of the United States can not determine whom the Democratic Party will nominate for President at its next convention, to be held at Houston, Tex. The Senator from Alabama has asserted over and over that the Governor of New York, Mr. Smith, will not be nominated; and he gave as his reason the assertion that Governor Smith is a Catholic.

Mr. HEFLIN. That he was a Tammanyite, a "wet," and a Roman Catholic.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And a Catholic, yes; and the Senator said that Democrats should hang their heads in shame at the mention of the name of Governor Smith.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for taking note of such an irrelevant declaration; but it does seem to me that the statement made from this side of the Chamber as with the authority and approval of the Democratic Members of the Senate should be denied.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it was not——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I never suggested the matter to any Democrat, and I do not care whether they indorse it or not. I am at liberty to speak about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that.

Mr. HEFLIN. I read a letter here from a man saying that Al Smith was going to be nominated, and so forth, and they discussed Mr. Hoover here the other day on the other side. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] discussed Smith and said he would be nominated and elected. Does the Senator from Arkansas propose to take the position that I can not say he will not be elected?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; the Senator from Arkansas does not take the position that the Senator from Alabama may not say anything he desires to say, but the Senator from Arkansas thinks that he also has the right to say a few things when he thinks the Senator from Alabama says things that ought to be replied to. The Senator from Alabama seems to think that it is a personal matter when the Senator from Arkansas differs from him regarding any statement that he makes. I do not take that view of the subject. I daily differ from my colleagues here. I have heard the Senator from Alabama a dozen times during the last year make what he calls his anti-Catholic speech. I have heard him denounce the Catholic Church and the Pope of Rome and the cardinal and the bishop and the priest and the nun until I am sick and tired of it, as a Democrat.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have the Senator make that speech in Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will make that speech in Arkansas, and I will make it in Alabama, too.

Mr. HEFLIN. If you do, they will tar and feather you.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. That shows the proscriptive spirit which dwells in the bosom of my friend from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. No——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He says that if I say here or in Arkansas or in Alabama that I am tired of hearing him abuse and denounce the Catholic Church, and the agencies of the Catholic Church, they will tar and feather me. That is illustrative, my friends, of how a good man can go wrong, and how far wrong he can go, and what a fool he can make of himself after he has gone wrong.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was replying——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have the floor. I will yield to the Senator if he will courteously address me. But now, Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has served notice on me, because I do not agree with him respecting this subject and the statement that he made about it, that he is in some mysterious way going to remove me from the leadership of this side of the Chamber. The Senator can attempt that at any time. I am going to call a conference tomorrow, and I challenge the Senator from Alabama to come before the conference and move the election of another leader for the Democratic Party of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We will take a vote on the subject there and find out whether the Senator from Alabama is entitled to discredit millions of good citizens of the United States in the name of the Democratic Party because of their religion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas misunderstood entirely what I said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said, not that we would elect another leader now, but that I resented—and I do resent—the Senator standing up and trying to lecture me for drawing my conclusions about why this thing has been done to me. The Senator has no right to lecture me as he is doing. I have a right to give my conclusions, and I want a roll call. I want every Senator's name called and to have him asked, "Do you condemn Senator HEFLIN for attacking the Knights of Columbus for trying to get us into war, and for introducing a resolution in regard to the activities in Nicaragua, and for making the speech he did in defense of himself? Do you condemn him? Call the roll." I would like to have that done, and every Democrat who wishes to repudiate me will not come back to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I refuse to yield further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas refuses to yield further.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Alabama announces that he does not propose to meet the issue about whether I am to keep the leadership of the Democratic Party in the Senate. He wants to raise another issue and have a vote on that.

Mr. President, I leave it to my colleagues whether I lectured the Senator from Alabama until he forced me to do so. I rose in the utmost of good faith, and in the kindliest spirit, to make a statement which I thought it was my duty to make, and which I know now it was my duty to make.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before I rose——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Before I rose the Senator said I had said something that was unworthy of me. If that is not lecturing me, what is it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I did say that it was unworthy of the Senator from Alabama to charge, expressly or impliedly, that the fact, if it be a fact, that Mrs. Hearst is a Catholic, had something to do with the insertion of the names in these documents, and I say now to the Senator from Alabama, in moderate language, that I am amazed, I am amazed beyond the power of expression, that he would bring the name of a lady into this controversy, even though she be a Catholic.

Mr. HEFLIN. What wrong was there in doing that, if she is?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator can not recognize it, I do not propose to waste the time of the Senate in telling him. A man of a chivalrous spirit would hold William R. Hearst responsible, rather than assail the wife of William R. Hearst, who is totally inoffensive, so far as I know, in this connection.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do hold him responsible, and the Senator ought to have held him responsible in his report. You never said anything about him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mrs. Hearst's name should never have been mentioned.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am responsible for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know that.

Mr. HEFLIN. And I resent the Senator——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I think it is unworthy of the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. HEFLIN. It is unworthy of you to say that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. All right. I can not settle that with the Senator from Alabama. It is another fact about which we differ.

The Senator from Alabama has said that Al Smith, because he is a Catholic, can not be nominated for President by the Democrats. He said that every Democrat ought to hang his head in shame when the name of Al Smith is mentioned. I have never been classed as an Al Smith supporter, but I have not been one of that class who believed that Governor Smith should be excluded from the list of candidates because he is a Catholic. I do not believe in excluding a candidate on account of his religion, nor do I believe in nominating a candidate on account of his religion. I believe, Mr. President, that one who is a Catholic has just as much right to apply for the favor of his party associates as one who is a Methodist or a Baptist, and I believe that when you deny that right you deny a fundamental principle of this Government.

I know that the proscriptive spirit has been powerful in every age, and I know it is easy for Senators who are eloquent and forceful and able, as is the Senator from Alabama, to fan the flames of religious hostility and animosity, and I know that as a result of prejudices thus created some of the bravest and best men who have served in public life have gone down to oblivion and defeat. Yet I know that it is the duty of a man who is a Democrat and who believes in our theory of government to stand for the equality of all men and not proscribe any man because of his religion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did the Senator hear me read the editorial from the Buffalo Union and Times saying that I was done, that I would be defeated at the next election, and that I should be defeated?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I may have heard it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator permit them to talk about a Protestant Democrat?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if I had my way about it, I would stop Catholics from abusing Protestants and Protestants from abusing Catholics. That is the only way you can have that degree of religious tolerance and friendly cooperation which the principles upon which this Government was founded contemplate. The general tenor of the address of the Senator from Alabama is unwholesome and harmful. I have not raised the question as to whether the statements made about him were justified. I know that many of them that have been brought to my attention are not justified. But I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for months and months the Senator has been repeating these so-called anti-Catholic speeches, and now he has brought into the Senate the question as to who shall not be nominated by the Democratic Party. He has said that we should hang our heads in shame at the mention of the name of Governor Smith.

Mr. HEFLIN. Have I not a right to suggest who ought to be nominated?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly; but have I not a right to reply to the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. Would the Senator suppress free speech in the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Alabama and I are perfectly amicable. He will be reappointing me to the committee the first thing you know, and I will be appointing him to some new committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to get the Senator right before I get through.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. The trouble about the Senator from Alabama is that he takes himself so seriously that he thinks he can dictate to the whole Democratic Party what is right.

Mr. HEFLIN. No——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I do not think he can do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. And I do not think——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is not any well-grounded feeling in the Democratic Party of antagonism toward Catholics. Many of our strongest supporters are members of the Catholic Church. Many of the greatest Democrats this Nation has known have been members of the Catholic Church. While I do not belong to the Catholic Church—and am a Methodist—the fact remains that one who looks at history with an unprejudiced eye can not fail to recognize the fact that the glory of this Republic and the luster of that flag and the promise which the future holds are locked up in the memory, the deeds, and the achievements of American citizens, and no distinction has been made or can be made as to what religion they professed.

When the storm of war swept the world and men were dying daily by thousands, and the best and tenderest this Nation could give was given; when women whose hands had never known the touch of toil had gone to the front and donned the uniform of the Red Cross, and were standing by the bedsides of the wounded and dying, and fighting back with valor delirium, disease, and approaching death, there was no question then as to whether they were Catholics or Methodists or Baptists.

Above the smoke of conflict there towered one figure, venerated by men, women, and children throughout the allied world. It was the figure of a cardinal—Cardinal Mercier—God bless his memory! No man made greater sacrifices, endured more prolonged hardships, faced death with more unyielding courage than this Catholic cardinal.

When I was a child, plague swept the city of Memphis, Tenn. My eye could not read because of my youth, but by the fireside one evening my father read in the New York Sun a story which made me appreciate the Catholic nun. Every home in Memphis was assailed by the plague. The story was that throughout the night carts laden with uncoffined bodies were being hurried out to new graveyards where burials took place without ceremony. Men, women, and children were fleeing in every direction. The plague shrouded the city and forecast the doom of thousands.

The Sun recounted the story that three women in the robes of Catholic nuns left the city of Baltimore on a train for the scene of sorrow, desolation, and death. These three women went into the face of danger, and fearlessly and resignedly sought to relieve the sufferings of their fellow beings. When at last the plague was lifted and the people began to return to their homes in Memphis and take up the affairs and duties of life again these three nuns had themselves fallen victims to the plague. They had died literally in efforts to relieve the sufferings of others; and out in an unknown graveyard, in graves that are unmarked to this day and will remain unmarked until the final judgment day, they sleep the sleep that knows no wakening. In all the years that have come and gone since then I have not been quick to ridicule or censure or defame the name of a Catholic nun.

Mr. President, I had not expected to claim the attention of the Senate for a longer period than was necessary to make the statement which I did make in the beginning and which was so heatedly challenged by the Senator from Alabama. I hope that whoever serves on the select committee of the Senate will be able to inform the Senate who forged the documents and to suggest the probable motive prompting those forgeries. But whether I continue to serve or am removed on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, I think that he has too long and too often injected the religious controversy into these debates. I do not challenge his right to differ from me, but as he differs from me he can not question my right to assert my own opinion.

Written deep in the history of all the centuries gone by is the record of persecutions, religious persecutions. If we follow the pathway that humanity has taken from the very beginning we will find it marked by a trail of blood. Catholics have persecuted Protestants; Protestants have persecuted Catholics; sins, shames, and crimes have been perpetrated in the name of religion. It is all contrary to the teachings of the Master and to the spirit of this Government, and he does his country no service who lights the torch or sounds the cry of religious intolerance and persecution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was utterly surprised and astounded at the position taken by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I do not know just why he felt called on to try to read a lecture to me, a Democrat, when my name had been drawn into one of the foulest manufactured scandals ever connected with a public man. I spoke my convictions on the subject as I had a right to do, and when the Senator from Arkansas rose to reply to me, to lecture me, I was astounded and I was offended by some of the things that he said.

I have a right to say who I think was involved in this scandal, who inspired it, who initiated it, and I have already said so. The Senator from Arkansas has evidently been preparing himself for a speech on this occasion. The peroration which he brought in about the nun and the soldiers in the Argonne and some priest named Mercier, all have nothing whatever to do with this matter. I have told what certain Catholics are now doing. I have told what the Knights of Columbus did at Philadelphia. The Senator from Arkansas can not deny the truth of my statements about that. I have shown that they passed a resolution denouncing their Government's policy and recommending that it cease that policy of peace toward Mexico. I have shown that a New York Congressman, a Roman Catholic, in the House, offered a resolution to sever diplomatic relations with Mexico and they had hearings on it, and no Protestant or Jew appeared to back it, nobody but Roman Catholics supported it. I have shown their activities in Nicaragua, where we are now killing American boys in defense of an imposter and usurper, a Roman Catholic president, and Catholic boys are nowhere in danger. They are far back of the firing line and Protestant sons of Protestant fathers and mothers are being butchered in Nicaragua. The Senator from Arkansas says nothing about that. One of them from my State has been killed. The war is going on there, and yet no act of Congress declaring war has been passed.

I rose here to tell what I think about certain Roman Catholics in the various walks of life who have attacked my honor and threatened my life. I referred to the Roman Catholic priest in New York who suggested that I should be waylaid and mobbed. None of these things have inspired the eloquence of the Senator from Arkansas. His heart has not gone out to me at any time while I have been fighting the battles of my country against the Roman Catholic machine that has sought to get the United States into war with Mexico. Not only has it sought it in the past, it is seeking now to do that very thing. This cardinal in Baltimore is in favor of it. The Catholic Daughters of America are in favor of it. While Lindbergh was in Mexico, carrying good will and friendship to those people, certain Catholics here are complaining that we are shaking hands with Calles and seeking to remain in cordial relations with the Government of Mexico. I am dealing with cold facts. I have read letters into the RECORD, a dozen or more, from Protestant Americans who tell me that they believe that the bringing of my name into this Mexican scandal is the result of a Roman Catholic conspiracy. I am reading their letters and drawing my own conclusions. And the Senator from Arkansas has gone out of his way as an American, and out of his way as a Democrat, and out of his way as the Democratic leader in this body, to undertake to fight the battles of Roman Catholics against a Protestant Senator who has been assaulted by them and who has been giving his convictions and conclusions on the subject.

It is unworthy of the Senator from Arkansas to stand up here and try to browbeat me because I dare to say what I please and what I think about Roman Catholics and Al Smith. If the Senator from Arkansas should declare for Al Smith, he will be beaten to a frazzle for the Senate in Arkansas. No doubt because of the speech he has made here to-day he will receive letters from Arkansas asking him what on earth he meant by his very strange conduct on this occasion. I will ask him to ask the Democrats on this side of the Chamber who of them disapprove of me saying what I please to say on this subject and who of them are ready to rebuke me for saying what I did to now stand up. There is not one of them who is worthy of being here who take such a stand by standing up. Not one. I dare such a one to stand. [Laughter.]

Yes, the Senator from Arkansas has not guessed right as to the sentiment on this side. The sentiment on this side of the Chamber does not approve of the very strange conduct of the Senator from Arkansas. He has felt called upon, somehow, to get up here and insult me and offend the American people who are supporting me all over the Nation in my fight to expose the insidious, mean, vicious effort of Roman Catholics to get the United States into war with Mexico. The Senator viciously attacks me because I am opposed to the Roman Catholic war program. I do not fear the Senator from Arkansas politically or in any other way. I resent his uncalled for and unwarranted meddling with me in this affair. I have a right to speak in the Senate about what I please, and let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that I have not yet even begun to speak about Al Smith. [Laughter.]

I am going to say a good deal about him for the entertainment, and let me hope for the enlightenment, of the Senator from Arkansas. This is still a free country and we still have free speech in the Senate.

I repeat in substance what I said here at the last session. If we had a majority of Roman Catholics in the Senate, I do not believe it would be possible for me to make the speech that I have made here this morning, but I had never expected to live to see the day when a Protestant Senator from Arkansas and a Democrat like JOE ROBINSON would stand up here and make the speech he did make in their defense and at the same time criticize and abuse an American Senator who has been scandalized by them in an effort to destroy him. One of the editors of a Roman Catholic paper, since this investigation was started and completed, has said that I had been denounced by the people of my State, which is a falsehood, and that I am doomed to defeat when I come up for reelection, because I have offended certain Roman Catholics.

Am I not at liberty to answer those attacks and say what I please as an American and a Democratic Senator without being lectured by the Senator from Arkansas? I dare him to make to the people of his home State, Arkansas, exactly the same speech he has made here to-day. If he were to speak to a thousand patriotic people in Arkansas and say exactly what he has said here to-day about me in the defense of Al Smith and the Roman Catholic machine behind the screen, they would hiss him in practically every audience in Arkansas. He does not represent the people of Arkansas in his strange attack on me. I will speak to Arkansas audiences this summer. I stayed out of there previously on account of the Senator and his colleague. I was invited in there to lecture all over the State. I did not want to stir up any subject there that might embarrass them in any way, but I am going in now. I am going to deliver about 20 lectures down there now. Whenever one of them challenges me on a vital principle I always try to accommodate him.

The Senator from Arkansas has challenged me, strange to say; and he has challenged me and insulted me when I stood here in defense of my honor; yes, and when I was giving my best judgment and conscientious conclusions as to who had inspired and initiated the connection of my name with this miserable Mexican scandal. I repeat the attack on me is the result of a Roman Catholic conspiracy, Mr. President. When I get up here, as I have a right to do, and tell the Senate who I think the enemies are the present leader of the Democrats in this Chamber and a member of the special investigating committee, who had nothing whatever to say in condemnation of Hearst had nothing whatever to say in condemnation of Avila, the villain and thief used in the case, now, strange to say, gets up and lectures me and praises Roman Catholics.

The committee report was, indeed, mild-mannered and weak on the crooks and criminals who slandered four United States Senators. They brought it in here and, of course, they exonerated us; there was nothing else that could be done, and that, of course, was all right; but they never arraigned Hearst in a single line. Why was that? Was it because of his close relations with Mellon? Was it because Mellon refunded him nearly $800,000 in taxes? What was it? And what was it that has moved my former friend from Arkansas to get into this debate in the manner that he has?

Lord, God of Hosts, be with us yet.

The idea of JOE ROBINSON [laughter] from the fine old State of Arkansas getting up here and making the speech he made to-day. I wonder if he could be fishing for the Al Smith support when we get through throwing him through the skylights of the convention? I wonder if he thinks that they will appreciate his efforts here to-day and rise up and say, "We will nominate you." Well, Joe, if the Roman Catholic machine nominates you, you have not got as much chance to be elected President as a mouse-colored mule has to operate an airplane in a nonstop trip to Paris. If that bunch nominates you as the heir to the Al Smith support, good bye Josephus; you are gone for keeps. [Laughter.]

The idea, Mr. President, of the Senator from Arkansas getting up here in the Senate and undertaking to lecture me under the peculiar circumstances that exist. If some Roman Catholic Senator had done it, it might have been excusable, for he would be expected to say something for the church or its political organization; but for the Senator from Arkansas to take it on himself without even consulting the Democrats on his side to stand up in the Senate and affront and offend and insult a Democratic Senator, the only Democratic Senator whose name was connected with this infamous Roman Catholic plot, to stand here and arraign him and insult him in a speech as he has done is unworthy of the Senator from Arkansas, and deserves to be denounced by every real Democrat in the Senate.

The Senator from Arkansas does not voice the views and convictions of the Democratic Senators on this side. The Democrats on this side of the Chamber—the self-respecting, brave Democrats, who are 100 per cent Americans—are not in sympathy with the Senator from Arkansas, who has tried to rebuke me for making the speech that I wanted to make under the conditions that exist. I dare say that there is not another Protestant Senator in this body on either side who would have gotten up here and made just such a speech as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has made. I am not sure that I know who the gentleman was who walked down and sat down by and talked with Senator ROBINSON a little while before he spoke, but I am almost sure that he is a Roman Catholic Congressman from New York. [Laughter.]

Oh, Mr. President, we are coming to a miserable pass in this body under the present leadership on the Democratic side if a Democratic Senator whose honor has been assailed can not get up and speak his convictions and tell the truth to his colleagues and to the country as he sees the truth—it makes no difference whether he is talking about Catholics, Protestants, or Jews; that is his business. Then for the Senator from Arkansas to get up and tell me that I ought not to have said that Mrs. Hearst is a Catholic. That was a link in the chain of circumstance and testimony that I obtained. I showed that the other parties were Catholics, and that this man's wife was a Catholic, and this book on Jesuitism says the wife frequently controls the husband by mental manipulation. Of course, the Senator from Arkansas did not know anything about that; some other sort of manipulation got him going, and so he gets up and undertakes to rebuke me and speaks about my speech "being unworthy of the Senator from Alabama."

Let the people who hear me and who read it be the judges of that. Since the Senator has taken the strange stand he has I do not care what the Senator's opinion as to whether my position is worthy or unworthy. I do not care the snap of my finger. The Senator from Arkansas has taken a strange position and one that is unworthy of him. He had no right to take such an unwarranted position as the leader on this side of the Senate without first consulting the Democrats on this side. He has got no right as leader to intrude himself in as he has done to-day and arraign a Democrat who has been assailed by these villains who have tried to destroy me as a Senator of the United States. They have attacked my honor, Mr. President, and I think more of that than I do of the wealth of the world. After I have discussed matters with reference to myself and then quoted great Baptist preachers and great Methodist preachers, and quoted Grant and Lincoln and Jefferson, Roosevelt and Voltaire and Luther and Garibaldi and Savonarola, all warning us against the dangers of the Roman Catholic political machine, the Senator from Arkansas rises up and makes a speech—a very bitter speech—and suggests what I have done, his Democratic colleague, is an outrageous thing. He will be petted and praised by the Roman Catholics. The hierarchy will put a wreath of appreciation and approval upon his brow; they will even let him kiss the cardinal's ring. Oh, they will accord great honors to him. They have always been able, strange to say, to get some Protestant to wade into the breach and take up the cudgel and fight their Roman Catholic battles. But I never thought that they would ever be able to get so intelligent a man as the Senator from Arkansas to come to their rescue at a terrible time like this. But they got him into it to-day; and he winds up by telling about three nuns who died down there in a plague in Memphis some 30 years ago. I am sorry about that, but I am in no way to blame for that.

He tells us about others whom he knew in his youth. I have not said anything about those things. I am not discussing them here to-day. I have not said anything about Catholic soldiers who fought worthily in France. I honor every one of them who did his duty; but I am talking about Roman activities here in America and telling about those of them who are still trying to get us into war with Mexico in behalf of the Catholic Church, and also about their efforts to destroy me because I opposed their Mexican war program.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think I will. I think too much of the Senator. I am afraid he might say something that would cause me to feel like operating on him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should be very glad to have the Senator operate on me if he would give me the same chance on him.

Mr. HEFLIN. I like the fine young Senator from Maryland, but I can not yield to him just now.

Mr. President, I repeat, I honor every Catholic who has done his duty by our country, but I am speaking of those who have harmed me and who are already boasting and rejoicing at what they think is my defeat for reelection, in view of the scandal they have put upon me. They would rather have me out of this body than anything else in the world, except the election of Al Smith for President. They would rather drive me out of the Senate than anything that could happen except putting Al Smith in the White House; but they are not going to do either.

I can beat, and I will beat if I live, anybody they run against me in Alabama, I do not care who it may be; and if the Senator from Arkansas will make a speech such as he has made here to-day, they will beat him in Arkansas ten to one. If he will make that speech in Arkansas exactly as he made it here—and I want him to leave it just like he made it in the RECORD—he is going to have a hard time to come back even if nobody runs against him. [Laughter.] They would come mighty near beating him without any opposition.

But, Mr. President, I want to say before I close, and I have been on this floor quite a long time already, that my feelings are hurt. I am deeply offended at the course the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has taken. I never dreamed that he could be induced to take such a stand. All that I hold dear has been assailed in this Hearst-Mexican-Roman Catholic scandal—my good name, my honor, my integrity, the reputation that I have tried to build with faithful service to my country. I have done what I thought was my duty; I have come here and laid the facts as I had them, and given the conclusions as I have reached them to the Senate, and I am rebuked, strange to say, by the minority leader. The Roman Catholic Senators sat back and smiled as the Senator from Arkansas attacked me, and many of the other Democrats have frowned their disapproval. They do not, they can not indorse his strange stand. None but those who are dependent upon the Catholic vote to reelect them do indorse his course, and I trust they will not cause me to call their names. If they do, I will name them; I know them. There are three or four of them. They would do a heap of things to obtain that support, and they would attack me if pressed into service.

I can not understand, I repeat, why the Senator from Arkansas has done this thing. If he has consulted with any Senator on this side and told him that he was going to assail me in this fashion, I should like for the Senator with whom he consulted to stand up now and let me and the Senate know who advised or sponsored such a thing. If there is a Democratic Senator on this side who approves his attack upon me for saying what I wanted to say in a matter involving my honor and integrity, I want him to stand up and show where he stands. [A pause.] No one stands and the Senator from Arkansas does not have the approval of the real Democrats on this side.

Mr. President, I have no religious prejudice. [Laughter.] I am simply a whole-hearted American. I wish the Catholics well if they will set up American ideals and love and serve this country and stop that political machine working behind the screen and under the cloak of the Roman Catholic Church. I am willing for them to have their religion, but I am not willing for them to have the United States Army to fight their religious battles in foreign countries. I am not willing for them to take Protestant boys or Catholic boys or Jewish boys from Arkansas and Alabama and other States and transport them to Mexico to fight and die to restore the Catholic Church to power in that country.

The Catholic Church, we are told, has acquired half of the lands of Mexico; and how did it get them? When the wealthy landowner came to die the priest told him, "If you will deed your property to the Roman Catholic Church, we will pray you out of purgatory." That is the way, we are told, they got half the lands of Mexico; and the suddenly made poor Mexican families, stripped of their substance, bereft of their homes, were set adrift in Mexico; the church had gotten the estate. In this way the Catholic Church accumulated half the lands of Mexico. The Roman Catholic priests went amongst the farmers and would not let them plant their crops until they had paid them a fee to bless the soil so that it would produce in abundance. They raised money from them in that way. Furthermore, they had in the Mexican constitution a provision that no Protestant or other religion could exist in Mexico—none but the Roman Catholic religion. And now the Roman Catholics of the United States are still trying to involve us in war with Mexico because of the Roman Catholic Church.

I got into the discussion of this question as an American Senator following the speech of the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I spoke for my country and the lives of our boys. I have got no apology to make for it; I am going to continue to fight to keep them from using our Army for such a miserable purpose.

They are never going to take American boys out of Arkansas and Alabama and kill them in the cause of the Pope in Mexico, if I can help it. It does not make any difference how many times the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] attacks and abuses me, he will not, he can not, intimidate me or drive me from my duty in this matter. I will continue to carry on.

Mr. President, Senator ROBINSON is a member of the committee appointed to try this case in which I am involved, and strange to say he has become a partisan before the thing is over, and stands here and undertakes to lecture me and to prosecute me, a man accused by the villainous bunch that I am discussing. The position of the Senator from Arkansas is inexcusable and indefensible. Of course, I object to him continuing further on that committee. I would not be just to myself and the questions of the decent and honorable proprieties involved longer to permit this Senator, since his performance here to-day, to remain on the committee to investigate the Hearst-Mexican-Catholic scandal.

Why, Mr. President, in view of what the Senator from Arkansas has done here to-day, when my honor and character have been unjustly and scandalously attacked, I could not even think of permitting him, if I can help it, to remain on the committee. I am deeply in earnest about it, and must ask him to retire from that committee.

I had nothing to do with selecting the committee. Of course, there are some others on that committee that I do not regard as my very warmest personal friends, but I was not considering that. I was willing for any Senate committee to investigate the slanderous charges. The other members have not yet undertaken to persecute or prosecute me. That remained for the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], strange to say.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama the Senate proceed to vote on the question as to whether I shall continue a member of the special committee of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I object, Mr. President. I want the Senate to hear me on that proposition. I certainly have a right to be heard on it. I will bring it up in due time. The Senator from Arkansas need have no fear about that.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Arkansas last interrupted me I was about to conclude my remarks.

The attack on me by the Senator from Arkansas can not be defended; it was inexcusable and indefensible. There never has been anything like it in the history of this body that I know anything about. Strange, indeed! On a committee of Senators to try this case, having exonerated me, and still holding the committee in existence for some other purpose, the Senator rises, a juror in the case trying me and other Senators, and proceeds to prosecute one of the men who has been under investigation before him. Great God! There is not anything like it in history that I can now recall. I repeat, the conduct of the Senator from Arkansas is inexcusable and indefensible.

Let me close by saying to the Senator that I, too, had a youth time. When I was about 12 years old my father and mother commenced to have family prayer. My father was a country doctor and a farmer. There were eight boys of us, and one girl. One night my father was called off to see somebody who was sick and my mother held prayer. I shall never forget that picture. With a little center table with two or three lighted candles on it and the big family Bible, she read the Twenty-third Psalm, and then knelt down with us children all about the hearthstone and prayed. She prayed to God to bless her children, to make them honorable and useful in the world.

Mr. President, I have never forgotten that prayer. I have never forgotten the teaching that she gave me, or the teaching of my good father. Both of them have gone to their reward. I was a poor boy. I struggled for an education. I borrowed the money that enabled me to go to college. I had a hard time—perhaps the hardest time of any boy in the family. When my mother died I carried the keys to the smokehouse and the pantry and gave out the provisions to the cook and looked after the housekeeping and then did work on my father's farm. I had a hard time, I thought; but I got along somehow, and the people of my State have been good to me. They elected me to local offices and then secretary of state of Alabama, then to Congress for 16½ years, and twice to the United States Senate.

I love the people of my State and they love and honor me. I think more of my honor as a native-born Alabamian and more of their loving favor than anything else connected with my public career. I have striven to do my duty. I have tried to do it as God has given me the light to see it; and when my honor and integrity have been assailed and dragged into the mire and filth of such a scandal as this, it has touched and aroused every fiber of my indignation and resentment. And, Mr. President, in the name of the sainted mother who gave me birth and in the name of my good wife, who has departed this life and gone to her reward, leaving to me the fine and manly boy who bears my full name, I want to say that I had rather leave to him a good name, the name of a father who had met honestly and courageously all the engagements of his public life and had done his duty as he saw it, than anything else in the world.

Mr. President, nearly all Senators, I believe, will understand and appreciate my resentment at the conduct of the Senator from Arkansas when he gets up here and champions the cause of those who have attacked and slandered me. I resent and repudiate his strange and inexcusable performance here to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the business before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 112.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to address myself to that question.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 112) opposing the seating of FRANK L. SMITH as a Senator from the State of Illinois, reported from the special committee investigating senatorial campaign expenditures.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the opportunity was denied me to participate in the brief debate which ensued at the opening of the present session over the admission of claimants to seats here from the States of Illinois and Pennsylvania. The attitude taken by one of them, bringing the subject again thus early before us upon the report of the committee to which it was referred, warrants me in submitting some observations on the constitutional aspects of the question presented by the course pursued toward them. He, in effect, as I understand the situation, stands mute in the face of the charges against him, and declines to discuss or meet them until and unless he is provisionally seated, thus renewing the controversy over the right of the Senate under any circumstances to halt at the door a claimant coming with a certificate of election until his qualifications and the legality of his election shall have been inquired into.

When the question was presented at the last session of the Senate of its right under the Constitution to deny a seat in this body to FRANK L. SMITH, it turned upon the interpretation to be given the word "qualifications" in that clause of our organic law providing that each House of the Congress shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members. SMITH claimed, under appointment from the Governor of the State of Illinois, to fill the unexpired term of the late lamented Senator William B. McKinley, whose death followed speedily upon the primary preceding the general election of 1926 in which he was defeated for the nomination of his party by SMITH; his election, as the returns showed, being offered by the governor as one, at least, of the moving considerations for his appointment.

A committee of the Senate had meanwhile reported that there had been spent in the primary to encompass his nomination a sum in excess of $458,782, considerably more than the amount reported in the Newberry case, concerning which the Senate declared by formal resolution—

> The expenditure of such excessive sums, either by a candidate or by his friends and relatives in his behalf, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

It will be recalled that that resolution originated with and was supported by the friends of Newberry, not by those who sought to exclude him. It was condonatory in character; and, if it had any purpose except as a means of escape for some Senators whose conscience drove them to one course while party expediency pulled in the opposite direction, it must have been intended as a warning that the Senate would not stand for a repetition of such extravagant use of money to break into this body.

But that was not the head and front of the offending of SMITH. He was at the time of the nomination and election, and for a number of years theretofore had been, the chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, charged with the duty of fixing the rates to be charged by and otherwise regulating corporations operating as public utilities in that State. The heaviest contributor to his campaign fund was shown to be Samuel Insull, the managing head of public utility corporations having a nominal capital of approximately a billion dollars, a gigantic and complex system, with ramifications in distant parts of the country, but centered in the city of Chicago, Ill., with business more or less continuously before the commission mentioned. Insull's contributions totaled the tidy sum of $158,735. Some Members of the Senate took the view that, considering SMITH's flagrant disregard of the warning given in the Newberry case, considering his total disregard of the decencies in accepting huge contributions from a suitor, either existing, past, or prospective, before the tribunal of which he was the head, he had shown himself disqualified for membership in this body. If anyone doubts the soundness of the conclusion thus arrived at, let him imagine a Senate composed of men all of whom, or any considerable number of whom, were of such easy political virtue or who were similarly tied to favor-seeking corporations or their masters.

It was contended, however, and now is insisted in behalf of SMITH that the Senate was powerless thus to preserve its own integrity. On the one hand it was claimed that one legally elected or appointed, possessing the qualifications of age, citizenship, and residence, specified in the Constitution, must be admitted, whatever may be his deficiencies either in character or in intellect. On the other hand, it was insisted that the Constitution absolutely forbade the admission of one wanting in any of the three particulars mentioned, but left the Senate free otherwise to judge of the qualifications of the claimant; and attention was directed to the peculiar language, negative in character, of the Constitution:

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State for which he shall be chosen.

It must be admitted that either contention, followed to its ultimate and logical conclusion, leads perilously near, if it does not precipitate its supporters over, the brink of absurdity. The advocates of the one theory must admit, if they are correct, that, having the three constitutional qualifications, a State may send here a convicted felon, the perpetrator of a foul murder, even a traitor whose hand has been raised against his country, and who, unregenerate, may be plotting against its very life. This august body must admit him. No crime, however heinous, no moral turpitude, however grave, can bar him. Nor is it to be regarded as too speculative to indulge in the supposition of the election of one thus clouded in character or reputation.

After the Civil War there appeared repeatedly at the bar of both Houses, demanding admission, Members elect who had participated in that unfortunate conflict on the part of the Confederate States. Whatever may be said either in justification or in extenuation of their course, whatever moral aspect it may bear, they were technically guilty of treason against the United States. Such a situation is not unlikely to arise after any unsuccessful revolution. The Constitution contemplates that such a crisis may confront the country, for it defines treason as levying war against the United States or giving aid and comfort to its enemies. Yea, it assumes that even high officials may be involved in such guilt, for it declares that Members of Congress shall be exempt from arrest except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace while attending the sessions, or going to or returning from the same.

And the uprising of 1861 is by no means the only instance in our history when the authority of the Federal Government was defied by force of arms. Aaron Burr was tried and John Brown hung for treason. The whisky rebellion and the Dorr rebellion were quickly suppressed. It is not difficult to conceive Burr, his hands red with the blood of Alexander Hamilton and under suspicion not yet cleared of plotting the dismemberment of the Union, as having been elected to the Senate by a Western State, or John Brown, escaping on some technicality, returning triumphantly to the Capital as a Senator from bleeding Kansas.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I recognize the Senator as a man familiar with the Constitution of the United States and with the history of our country. Is it not a fact that because many thoughtful men, regardless of politics or partisanship, reached the conclusion that men who had been in rebellion against our Government were nevertheless eligible for election to this body, the fourteenth amendment was proposed and ultimately became a part of the Constitution? I am asking the Senator if that is not historically the origin of and one of the reasons assigned for the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let us not get into a state of confusion about this. The fourteenth amendment adds other disqualifications. It disqualifies one who, having taken an oath to support the Constitution, afterwards engages in rebellion. The Congress was still left in its own discretion, as it had been theretofore, to exclude him for other causes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But without that amendment, a citizen who had engaged in open rebellion against this Government was eligible for a seat in this body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He was not absolutely excluded, but each House of Congress, by the Constitution, was to judge of his qualifications, and they invariably decided that he did not have the qualifications under such circumstances.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Those precedents we will deal with hereafter; but permit me to put the matter in this form: It is my firm belief that prior to the adoption of that amendment, any citizen of any State possessing the qualifications, of age, citizenship, and inhabitancy, was eligible for election and for a seat in this body, notwithstanding his theretofore open conduct of rebellion, and I am of the opinion that it was because learned Members of this body, representing both sides of the Chamber, reached the conclusion that there was nothing in the Constitution as of then to bar him; that because of that belief it was sought to bar him, and he was barred, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But he was not. He was only barred if he had theretofore taken an oath to support the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly, one who had taken the oath mentioned, as was the case of a certain Senator who had retired from this body to join in the rebellion. Of course, he had taken an oath. Afterwards, if he sought to reenter this body, it was believed by many that he was eligible, but there were those who thought that such a thing should never be possible; hence the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Hence the fourteenth amendment, and particularly subdivision 3 of that amendment; but without that amendment he was eligible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senate could bar him or not as it saw fit.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; the Senate could not bar him, according to my view, and that was the view of the Senate as then constituted. Of course, there may have been difference of opinion in regard to that point.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I take it that the country realized that either House was at liberty to seat these people or not to seat them, but in view of the high passions that were aroused then the country intended to take that discretion away from both Houses by the fourteenth amendment as to the particular class therein mentioned.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And, of course, to that intense passion and heat I attribute some of the precedents upon which men now rely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator now, as I asked another Senator upon the other side, suppose the Senator in his place here immediately after the war and one of these men, before the fourteenth amendment was adopted, came here with a certificate from the governor of a State. How would the Senator vote?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am glad that question is put to me. I answer it categorically and plainly. As the Constitution then stood, upon the reconstruction or the coming back into the Union—if it was ever out of the Union—of a given State, if its legislature—the Legislature of Georgia, for example—had properly elected any man who met the qualifications of a Senator as I understand them to be, even though he had led the Confederate forces in the Battle of Gettysburg, a distinguished southern soldier, I would have voted to admit him into this body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator thinks so now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was not then alive to so think.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But if I had been, I would have thought so and done so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is the Senator able to tell us how the Senators from his State voted on the matter at the time?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; offhand I am not. There were some very great Democratic Senators from California, as the Senator knows so well, and some Republicans, through the years. I do not remember how they voted. But let me say this, that there would have been another reason why I would have voted to admit him, and I say this, feeling very deeply on the subject. I would have voted for him because the erring son was returning, and if he came back here to enter this Chamber, to take an oath to support his Constitution, I would have welcomed him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Most of the members of the Senator's party, however, took a very different view about it at that time.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may be so, but I am speaking for my own poor self.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, having presented one horn of the dilemma, I proceed to present the other.

It is true that if the other alternative be taken and it be held that either House may go beyond the three qualifications specified in the Constitution, there is no limit to its discretion in excluding one legally elected to membership. It may reject him for the most trivial cause, for any cause originating in its whim or caprice, on account of the color of his hair, the cut of his clothes, or his racial origin. But in every act of that character it would be restrained by the force of public opinion, if not by the oath each member must take, and by his conscience and self respect, regardless of his oath. After all, ours is pretty much a government by public opinion. Any gross offense, such as that supposed, would be likely to bring retribution at the polls. The power might be abused. If it were lacking, treason might stalk these halls unmolested.

Both Houses have wisely settled the question in favor of the existence of the power. After some vacillation they both eventually, after the Civil War, excluded at will, and repeatedly excluded, those who had been in arms against the Union. The House refused to permit Brigham Roberts, coming here with four wives, to take the qualifying oath. It turned down Victor Berger for lack of loyalty to the country during the World War. Just what offenses, just what lack of moral principle, will justify resort to the power to exclude, is nowhere defined, and perhaps it is well that no attempt should be made to define it. The Constitution does not specify upon what grounds a member may be expelled. Each House it says—and says only—may by a two-thirds vote expel a Member.

Official conduct is judged by different standards in different times. Most of us will recall when all Members of Congress and most judges traveled on railroad passes. A Federal judge who toured the country gratuitously in the private car of an officer of a railroad company was dismissed by this body sitting as a court of impeachment, most of the triers having accepted like favors. In our times a Member would be expelled for speculating in the public funds while legislation affecting their value was pending, as did half the Members of the First Congress while Hamilton's financial measures were before it.

So much has been said because there has been a renewal of the charge in journals, usually apologetic concerning corruption, that in the case of SMITH the Senate manifested the mob spirit and flouted the Constitution. A former Member of this body, with more asperity than reason, elaborates that view in an article lately published.

The issue before us relates, however, rather to the validity of the election than to the qualifications of the claimants challenged. Both questions, however, are here involved. Of the right of the Senate to determine whether either was duly and legally elected there is no room for dispute. It is insisted, however, that pending the determination of that question they must be sworn in and accorded all the privileges of membership because they come here with the certificate, the one from the Governor of Illinois and the other from the Governor of Pennsylvania. Much oratory is indulged in concerning the sanctity of such a certificate from the executive of a sovereign State and the sacred right of a State to representation in this body. A book has been published under the pretentious title of "The Vanishing Rights of the States." Whatever merit it may have from a literary point of view, it masquerades as a scientific discussion of a public question, when in reality it is a brief for WILLIAM S. VARE, the author having recently been rewarded by that gentleman with a seat in the House of Representatives, handed to him just as parliamentary seats were bestowed on court favorites in the good old days of the rotten boroughs by the proprietors thereof.

The book features the career of John Wilkes, and that is where the funny part comes in; Wilkes, invoked in defense and support of corruption, in fighting which he gained his place in history. It is said that the devil can cite Scripture to his purpose. Well, he can cite history, too. God works in a mysterious way His wonders to perform, and He often uses queer instruments to effect His purposes.

Wilkes came upon the scene in the stirring decade that preceded our Revolutionary War. George III was struggling to rule after the arbitrary and tyrannical fashion of his Hanoverian ancestors, but the Parliament stood in his way. Well, he would buy the Parliament with royal smiles, with the equivalent of those days of rides on the Mayflower and breakfasts of buckwheat cakes and maple sirup; with appointments and promotions; with titles dear to the heart of an Englishman; and, where necessary, with cold cash.

The historian Green tells us that "the elections for the new Parliament, which met in 1768, were more corrupt than any that had as yet been witnessed," and he adds that "even the stoutest opponents of reform shrank aghast from the open bribery of constituencies and the prodigal barter of seats."

It was in that heyday when Walpole gave expression to his famous apothegm, "Every man has his price." George found that a good many had. Not Wilkes. He was a scurrilous scoundrel, of bad manners and worse morals. He was a facile writer with an inexhaustible command of billingsgate, which he let loose in unrestrained measure at the policies and persons of the ministers, and particularly at the venality of the court; in short, at the corruption that pervaded the entire government. His shafts of ridicule and invective were even directed at the sacred person of the King. While a member of Parliament in 1764 he was charged with publishing a seditious libel and fled to France to escape arrest. He returned in 1768 and boldly entered the campaign then in progress, and despite all the power of the Crown was elected from Middlesex. He was promptly expelled; and then ensued a game of battledore and shuttlecock, his constituency returning him three times more, the House excluding him as often. Meanwhile the treatment he had had gave rise to riots. Mobs paraded the streets of many of the cities shouting "Wilkes and liberty." The populace was strongly with him. He became even more a hero in America than in England. A thriving town of Pennsylvania—Wilkes-Barre—took its name from him and another critic of the Crown and friend of the Colonies, Colonel Barré. He managed eventually to hold his seat and in 1782, when the ministry came in that called off the war with the States, the record of his repeated expulsion and other proceedings of the Commons against him was expunged.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, the Senator has in mind that sovereignty rested in that body—in the Parliament—whereas our powers here are delegated powers, and we have no power unless it is specifically or necessarily impliedly delegated; wherefore the Parliament, claiming that the power rested in it or the House of Commons, not controlled, as I think we are controlled, by a written Constitution delegating our power, the House of Commons could do anything it saw fit to do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; but the Supreme Court of the United States decided the other day that there are implied powers in each House which are not expressed in the Constitution at all.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why, many powers are implied, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. We contend that it is implied that each House has the right to protect itself against the inclusion of people of that character unless it is prohibited by the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Even though it reverses the judgment of a State?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A State must send its Members here subject to the provisions of the Constitution which give to this body the power to judge of his qualifications and also of his election.

What is the lesson of the Wilkes story? Obviously that the House of Commons freely exercised the power either to expel or exclude for any offense or delinquency which in its judgment rendered it dangerous to the public weal that the proscribed individual should become or continue a member of the national council. It may have exercised this plenary authority unwisely, unjustifiably at times, and possibly may have done so in the Wilkes case, but what harm has come to the British Nation by virtue of it?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just at that point?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not permit that statement to pass without giving it, as I believe it deserves, a little more emphasis than the Senator has given it.

The case the Senator has been referring to was given by Mr. BECK in his book as an illustration to show that neither the Senate nor the House possessed this power. He gave that as an illustration. As the Senator has truthfully said, the very illustration is a demonstration that the Parliament exercised the very power that we are exercising here and which he is trying to deny in the argument he is making.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. So that his only illustration is an illustration from history that the Parliament exercised the power which he is trying to prevent us from exercising here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He sought to demonstrate that because the Parliament of Great Britain did what it had no right to do, the Congress of the United States has no right to do this because the Parliament of Great Britain did not have that right.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I add just this observation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Parliament was not restrained and constitutionally they did have a right to do what they did. It may have been unwise, it may have been altogether improper for other reasons, but they had the constitutional right and power to do what they did.

Mr. NORRIS. But the author of this book has selected that as an illustration.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not care anything about that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Montana has not selected the illustration. He is taking it from the book, the author of which is trying to demonstrate that we do not possess this power.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I want it always borne in mind that there is nothing in the written law, or indeed the unwritten law of Great Britain, which controlled the action of the House of Commons, whereas I must ever bear in mind that our power is a delegated power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that perfectly well. The Senator always gets back to the proposition that there are three provisions in the Constitution describing the disqualifications. We understand that perfectly. I thought I had passed that. I was endeavoring to present, as fairly as I know how, the items on both sides of the question, and then

I said that considering the safety of our Government we ought to adopt the conclusion for which I contend.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I want, of course, to make it an indestructible Union. That is why I stand so firmly for the views I entertain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I understand, and I shall discuss that a little later.

Some of us will recall the case of Bradlaugh, the blatant atheist. He not only denied that the heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth His handiwork, but he proclaimed it in season and out of season, if, indeed, there be a season for such preachment. He aired his peculiar conceptions incessantly, coarsely, blasphemously, to the serious offense of the God-loving people of Britain. He was expelled from the House of Commons, was reelected, and the Wilkes incident was repeated. It is said, however, that Wilkes having reached his popular favor in the Colonies, the framers of the Constitution, mindful of his fight, determined to deprive either House of the discretion in respect to the admission of Members exercised by the British House of Commons and to require it to admit any person, however lacking he might be in moral or intellectual fitness, or however patent might be his disloyalty to the Nation. If they had any such purpose they signally failed to express it. It would have been so easy, having said that no person shall be a Senator who has not arrived at the age of 30 years, been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who is not at the time of his election a resident of the State from which he is chosen, to add and "no other qualification shall be required," or to say, "Any person who is 30 years of age, who has been for nine years a citizen of the United States, and who at the time of his election is a resident of the State from which he is chosen is eligible to membership in the Senate." Other appropriate language might have been chosen.

The Constitution is itself sufficient evidence that the members of the convention by which it was framed were masters of English and adepts in the use of terse and appropriate language through which to express themselves. The idea must be rejected that they intended to prevent the exclusion of one whose loyalty was open to serious question or the lack of which had been demonstrated, or one notoriously wanting in integrity or any semblance of moral worth.

I recur to the contention that SMITH and VARE coming here with the formal certificates of election from the governors of their States, respectively, the Senate must admit them temporarily, and that they are entitled to all the privileges of membership until it is definitely decided by the Senate as to either that he has not been legally elected. As stated, such a certificate is the object of much panegyric. It is represented as a ponderous document of the highest probative value. In fact it is, in a contest at least, without any value whatever. It serves simply to cast the burden of proof upon the rival claimant not provided with it. Such a contest is governed by the rule of the preponderance of the evidence. If the evidence, exclusive of the certificate, favors the case of the contestant even to the extent of the twentieth part of our poor scruple, he gets the seat, the certificate can not overcome that paltry advantage, so weak it is.

In the Steck-Brookhart contest some claimed the preponderance of the evidence to be in favor of BROOKHART, others that the balance inclined to STECK, but no one supporting the claim of the former had the hardihood to assert that there was any value in the certificate issued to him, except to impose the burden of proof on STECK.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I propound a question to the Senator right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield again to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, the certificate is presumed to speak the truth.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And, of course, we take official knowledge of the laws of the State, and I suppose we indulge in the presumption that official duty has been regularly performed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Therefore, a credential certificate bearing the signature of a governor, countersigned and bearing the signature of the secretary of state, is presumed to speak verity, supported by the presumptions which I have mentioned. Now, until there is an appropriate attack upon that fact, thus presumed to be a fact, is not the holder of that certificate entitled to the benefit of all the facts it recites, of which the ultimate fact——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He is entitled to the benefit of the recital.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And the recital is that he has been duly elected, and being duly elected, it follows that he is entitled to enter upon the discharge of his duties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But my contention is that if some one comes in and controverts that situation, and a contest ensues and evidence is taken pro and con, the certificate does not amount to anything.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator and I will agree that at a certain stage, if, when he has had the benefit of the recited facts and enters upon the office, he is inducted into the office in question, then, of course, an attack may be made upon that certificate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall presently come to the proposition that the Senate is not obliged to accept that as the sole and exclusive evidence.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I shall rely upon Stephen A. Douglas and a few other very eminent Democrats.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Stephen was not regarded very highly as a lawyer.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He was, I think, a very great man.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I agree with the Senator—a great statesman.

It has occurred to me as remarkable that the line of argument giving occasion to these remarks should have been made for the obvious purpose of exciting misgivings on the part of Members from the South in the hope that they would abandon their party associates in this momentous matter. Audacity could hardly go further than to make such an appeal to them. What measure of sanctity would be ascribed by any Member on this side of the aisle to the certificates of the governors of three Southern States reporting that the Hayes electors were chosen therein at the election of 1876? I address the inquiry in a special manner to the Senators from South Carolina, the Senators from Florida, and the Senators from Louisiana. If the certificate of FRANK L. SMITH is less tainted, it still comes from a governor, adjudicated by the courts of his State to be a defaulter to it to the tune of approximately a million dollars, and still elected, owing to a startling state of political morals in Illinois of which the report of the Reed committee gives us some inkling. The certificate presented by Mr. VARE comes from a governor elected through an unholy alliance between the VARE and the Mellon factions, each of which charged in the primary campaign that the other was out to corrupt the electorate and steal the election, each meanwhile spending such stupendous sums as to arouse the Nation.

Enough about the certificate extolled as being of such surpassing consequence.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator attach no importance to the word in the Constitution, namely, the word "judge"; that we must judge?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am going to talk about that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I hope so. We must judge here; we can not think of other things.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not failed to reflect upon these matters.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I also have devoted some time and thought to them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The real question is as to whether the Senate must admit the man in whose behalf it is issued. If the Senate must admit him then it is not the judge, provisionally, of his election, but the governor of the State from which he comes is. By what language of the Constitution is any such power conferred upon the governor? It is conceded that the Senate is the judge of whether, being legally elected, he shall occupy a place permanently—that is, for the term—in this body; but by some strange course of reasoning it is contended that, pending an inquiry into the validity of his election, whatever proof may be at hand, however compelling may be the evidence before the Senate, he must be admitted.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question; and it will be the last?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Bear in mind that I court interruptions.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If I recall his words, the Senator asked, "Where is the power granting to the governor the right to certify?"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the right to decide that this man has been elected.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Must we not bear in mind that the Congress under the Constitution did not create the State; it did not create the governor, but the States created us, so to speak? They, the States, had the inherent original right and power to send delegates to a Congress. They limited their inherent original power or right, but we did not create the States or create their power. They had it; they claimed to be sovereign; and they never surrendered their sovereignty save to a limited degree in respect to this matter, namely, the sending of their delegates.

They limited themselves by saying, "We will only choose those who are, in the case of Members of the House of Representatives, 25 years of age, seven years a citizen, and an inhabitant of the State, and as to the Senate, 30 years of age, nine years a citizen, and an inhabitant of the State; but the power to choose them was an inherent original power in the original thirteen States. Wherefore I claim that they had the power——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The power to choose them was not original; it was conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not agree with the Senator as a legal or constitutional question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am simply dealing with the language of the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well.

Mr. REED of Missouri. And the decisions of the court are to the same effect.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The dogmatic announcements often heard uttered by the Senator from Missouri do not quite end the discussion.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not mean to be dogmatic; I merely suggested that the courts have decided the same way, and I will undertake to call the Senator's attention to the language of the law writers at the proper time.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There are many decisions and many discussions of the law writers that hold that the right to be represented in the Congress as set up by the Constitution was a right inherent in the States, and that they have never surrendered that right except to the limited degree agreed upon by them all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator mean by that that the right existed prior to the Constitution?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I mean it in the sense that there was a union among the States operating under the Articles of Confederation. Under those articles we waged the Revolutionary War. Nobody questioned the right of Virginia, or of New York, or of Pennsylvania to send delegates to the Congress organized and operating under the Articles of Confederation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Articles of Confederation themselves provided for such representation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I grant that; but it was a right which the States asserted, and they did not claim the right by virtue of any of the Articles of Confederation.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from California that the provisional Congress operated for a number of years before the Articles of Confederation were ever adopted.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it could not have operated under those articles, could it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was speaking of the Congress which operated under the Articles of Confederation.

Mr. BAYARD. But some Congress operated long before as well as during that period, and that prior Congress had nothing to do with the Articles of Confederation, so far as this particular suggestion is concerned, that is being discussed here to-day.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is quite true, but in the earlier Congress—we will call it the Colonial Congress—did anybody in New York question the right of Virginia to send Delegates?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that they did before or afterwards; but that is not the point; they were operating as a continuing body, notwithstanding the later adoption of the Articles of Confederation. So that contention has nothing whatever to do with the question before the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Perhaps it has not, but I think it has very great importance as a background to be considered in determining and construing the language found in Article I, section 3.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, whatever the view of the Senator may be, my own is that the Constitution of the United States grants to the States the right to send Representatives to both bodies of Congress.

I repeat it is conceded that the Senate is the judge of whether being legally elected he shall occupy a place permanently, that is, for the term, in this body, but by some strange course of reasoning it is contended that pending an inquiry into the validity of his election, whatever proof may be at hand, however compelling may be the evidence before the Senate, he must be admitted. It needs no argument that any such theory is in derogation of the powers conferred and the duty devolved upon the Senate by the Constitution. "Each House," that immortal document declares, "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members." What is it to be a judge? Does it not imply the weighing of evidence? There being no contest, the certificate of the governor is sufficient evidence of the election of the person recited therein to have been elected. There being no countervailing evidence the Senate finds him to have been elected and admits him. Every time a man comes here with a certificate the Senate judges whether he is elected or not. It determines the matter provisionally.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But in this instance there is no contest pending.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but there is evidence here just the same. It judges of his election. And even if there is a contest or protest, supported by ex parte affidavits, as is usually the case, the Senate may, and ordinarily one may say does, decline to regard such as proof and admits provisionally the claimant bearing the official certificate of election.

It is because in the great majority of cases—one might almost say that invariably heretofore it has been the case—no valid and competent proof to the contrary was before the Senate, and the claimant so armed was provisionally admitted, that the notion has prevailed, and is now somewhat spectacularly proclaimed by Mr. SMITH, that the Senate is under some kind of constitutional compulsion to admit him. It would abrogate its rights and fail in its duty if, having before it perfectly competent evidence to the contrary, it should admit to membership, even for a day, a claimant presenting himself with nothing more than a formal certificate of election. That the report of a committee of the Senate, based upon evidence taken by it under the direction of the Senate at hearings at which the claimant testified, of which he had notice and an opportunity to submit his proof, may be and should be considered by the Senate in determining whether Mr. SMITH should be provisionally seated is, as I think, indisputable. If in the judgment of the Senate the evidence so taken warrants his eventual exclusion either upon the grounds that he is disqualified or was not legally elected, it would be false to its trust to admit him provisionally.

To test the theory advanced that no proof is admissible to overcome the effect of the certificate of the governor in connection with the provisional admission of a claimant favored with it, let it be assumed that it has been determined upon indubitable evidence by the courts of the State from which he comes, in a contest over a State office, that the election relied upon was so tainted with fraud and corruption as to render it invalid, and that the candidate claiming to be elected Senator, realizing the importance of the contest as it affected his chances of obtaining the object of his ambition, had actually participated through counsel in the contest. Would anyone say that the Senate must shut its eyes to the adjudication so made and the proof so taken and give him a seat in this body, to be occupied possibly for a period equal to that for which Newberry was accorded membership in this body? I should like to address that question now to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator desire an immediate answer?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As promptly as the Senator can give it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A little later I hope to answer that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator answer it now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Well, I hold to the theory that when a certificate, we will say for brevity a credential, is presented to the Senate bearing the name of the governor of the State—and we can take judicial notice of the fact that he is governor—and also bearing the name of the secretary of state—and we can take official or judicial notice of that fact—and the certificate is in proper form and substance, my position is that he is entitled to enter upon his duties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that perfectly, but that is not the question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Wait a moment. Even though there has been testimony aliunde the record before the committee or whatnot, there being no contest pending as against the certificate, my answer is that he is entitled to the full benefit of that certificate and entitled to be sworn in. Then, if the facts which the Senator suggests in the question be properly proved, properly established, of course the Senate would take appropriate action. To answer otherwise, I think, is to deny to the State its right to be heard through accredited representatives sent by it. I draw a great distinction between the man and the official. Moreover, further answering the question, it is not the rights of the man that concern me, not the individual rights of the man, though he has certain rights; but I contend that any other position than that I have thus stated means this, that the informed, deliberate, official act of the State is reversed by this body before that State has a voice in the premises.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I addressed a categorical question to the Senator and he has not categorically answered it; he has merely declared his general attitude upon the whole subject. I ask him to assume that in the State of Montana an election was held at which a Senator was chosen as well as State officers; that a challenge was made of the validity of the election of a certain State officer in the State of Montana; that a trial was had in the court; that the man who claimed to have been elected Senator and who received the certificate was concerned about it and hired counsel who appeared in that lawsuit; that in that lawsuit it was determined that the whole election was so tainted with fraud that no man on the ticket was elected; that case went to the Supreme Court of the State of Montana and was affirmed there; that he came here with a certificate, and that the Senate had information concerning the proceedings out there, and the judgment of the court and the character of the evidence that was adduced. In that state of affairs I want to know what the Senate would do, whether it would exclude him or whether it would seat him and leave him here three years, as it did in the case of Newberry?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will answer that categorically. Assuming all those facts to be as stated, if, after they were admitted to be facts, the Governor of the great State of Montana should certify that this man had been regularly elected by the people of that State to represent them in this body for a period of six years, commencing on such and such a day, and the man should present himself here, I answer, he would be entitled to take the oath and be inducted into the office; and then we could take up the matters to which the Senator refers, and take appropriate action.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In my judgment, the Senate would simply abrogate its duty under the Constitution if it were to take any such course.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, I think that if we deny his right and the State's right to have him sworn, we are simply repudiating the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That brings me to another plaint in behalf of VARE and SMITH. The States from which they come, it is said, are denied their equal representation in the Senate, and reference is made to Article V of the Constitution in relation to amendments. That provision refers only to a proceeding by which a State would be deprived by constitutional amendment of its equal representation. The applicable provision of the Constitution is section 3, Article I, amended by the seventeenth amendment, declaring that the Senate shall consist of two Senators from each State, meaning that each State is entitled to elect two Senators—two qualified Senators—and the Senate is made the judge as to whether a particular State did, in fact, legally elect a Senator, and whether he is qualified.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The power of the Senate to decide that point is no greater than it was before to decide whether the legislature legally elected a given man.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, certainly not. It does not make any difference how he is legally elected.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Whether by the legislature or by the people.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the duty devolves upon the Senate to determine whether he has been legally elected.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And also whether he is qualified. The Senate is the judge under the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The question is, What are his qualifications?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The State is no more represented in the Senate by one not legally elected than if the seat were vacant. Newberry sat here for three years before, by the narrow margin of four votes, it was decided by the Senate in the spring of 1922 that he had been legally elected; but, reading the handwriting on the wall after the election in the fall of that year, he promptly resigned. Can anyone say that while here he represented the State of Michigan?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator and I tried to keep Senator BROOKHART here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. We thought that he was legally elected.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Can anyone say that while here Newberry represented the State of Michigan?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator pardon me? Then I will not interrupt again.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But apply that same question to our friend here from Iowa.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Senator BROOKHART came here with credentials from that State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He was sworn in.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; and there was no evidence before the Senate to the contrary.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; but wait a moment. He sat here for a year or two.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And the Senate then determined that he was not properly elected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; so the Senate determined that he was not representing the State of Iowa.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Ah, but I think he was, during that period, representing the State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How could he be if he was not legally elected?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is a mere quibble on words. The acts of a judge on the bench, appointed, but not yet confirmed, are legal acts.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is because of the necessities of the case, not because it is right.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It may be so, and I do not approve of it myself. I do not think a man should sit on the bench until he is confirmed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The difficulty about that is that we are made the judges of senatorial elections, and the judges are not made the judges of their designation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But if Newberry, for example, did not in part represent during that period the State of Michigan, then the Senator's argument, of course, goes to the point that Senator BROOKHART did not represent Iowa.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly; I agree with the Senator. The Senate, by excluding him, said, "You do not represent the people of Iowa. You have no business here."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Meantime he did vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; he did vote, no doubt. That is the trouble about the thing. That is the point I am making. You allow a man to come in here who has no right to come in here, and you let him vote for two or three years.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. You can not tell anything about that argument until you test the legal principle.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire again, Can any one say that while he was here Newberry represented the State of Michigan? So pronounced was the revulsion of feeling in that great State at the methods by which he gained an apparent right to membership in this body that for the first time since Lewis Cass quit public life in the fifties of the last century, 75 years ago, if I have my history aright, it sent a Democratic Senator here in the person of our revered colleague, Senator FERRIS, and then it sent another great Senator who, though nominally a Republican, has been a thorn in the side of the Republican organization that backed Newberry ever since he joined us, but of whom it may be said without flattery that there is no more industrious, independent, or useful Member of the Senate.

Who is there that can say the State of Illinois is being denied representation in this body because FRANK L. SMITH is not permitted to participate in its deliberations or vote on measures before it? If the State of Illinois permits its elections to be so conducted as to throw serious doubt upon the title of one claiming to be elected as Senator, how may it justly complain if he is denied admittance until it can be ascertained whether he has or has not been legally elected?

If he should be seated, and it should eventually be determined that he was not legally elected, my State and yours, every State in the Union, every citizen thereof, and the stranger within our gates, would be bound by legislation which, perchance, but for his influence and vote, would never have been enacted. It is not too much to say that the course of our history was profoundly affected by the votes of Newberry while he was here. The Senate acted within its rights and powers, and, as I think, wisely and justly, in denying SMITH a seat provisionally among us, and should proceed to judgment upon his ultimate right to membership in this body mindful of its honor and splendid traditions.

Before closing, I am moved to advert to a theory of our Government advanced in the course of the debate yesterday that ought not to go unchallenged. It was boldly asserted that however tainted with corruption the nomination of a candidate for the Senate may be, though it be established that it was procured by open and revolting bribery, the facts being published during the campaign, and thus brought to the notice of the electors of the State, who nevertheless give him a plurality of the votes cast, his election is unimpeachable and he must be seated; that to reject him is to impair a sacred right of his State. The fact that he is a confessed or proven bribe giver is of no consequence in the view of the Senator who maintains that neither that nor any other villainy disqualifies him for membership here, and the fact that wholesale bribery in his interest characterized the primary is of no consequence, since only the ultimate election counts. It follows, though it was not so stated, that it is equally without importance that his transgressions were not generally known to the people of the State before they voted for him.

The proposition thus advanced scarcely requires refutation. Baldly stated, as it was on this floor, it is too shocking for acceptance.

In the opinion of Chief Justice White in the Newberry case, contending for the right of Congress to legislate in relation to primaries for the nomination of party candidates, he called attention to the practice which prevailed in some States, under the old system of electing Senators by vote of the legislatures, of nominating party candidates in conventions, the members of a legislature thus being persuaded to surrender their individual views and to vote for the party nominee; and to the extension of that practice until, under the Oregon system, a member of the legislature was under the strongest compulsion to vote for the candidate favored in the popular election. He referred to the fact that electors of President and Vice President invariably voted for the nominee of the party, and would be regarded as acting dishonorably, even traitorously in a party sense, if they did otherwise.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Presidential electors?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. In that connection he recalled that James Russell Lowell, a Republican elector of the State of Massachusetts, was strongly importuned, following the election of 1876, to rebuke the scandalous proceedings by which an apparent Republican majority in the Electoral College was secured, by voting for Tilden; but, eminent statesman and high-minded man that he was, he declined, asserting that custom had so sanctioned the change in our system, making electors mere automatons, that he could not honorably depart from it. And the learned justice argued that in like manner the influence of the nomination upon the voter was so compelling that fraud in procuring it might properly be regarded as vitiating the election or, at least, was so intimately associated with the making of the choice in the final election in respect to Members of Congress as that the purity of the nominating process might properly be safeguarded by national legislation. Pursuing this line of argument, he called attention to the fact that in quite a number of the States the election of the candidates of the dominant party invariably or almost invariably follows their nomination, so that the only contest therein occurs before the primary.

In a number of Southern States the strife is between Democratic candidates in the primary; in Illinois and Pennsylvania the real fight occurs in the Republican primaries. It is quite immaterial whether or not one accepts the view of Chief Justice White and his concurring associates that Congress may legislate concerning primaries at which candidates for Members of Congress are chosen. My own opinion is that his argument is irrefutable.

The Australian ballot system necessarily ties the primary to the ultimate election and makes them both equally a part of the machinery of the choice. But, whether the Congress may or may not legislate with respect to primaries, it can inquire, and ought to inquire, whether in any of the steps leading to the ultimate choice the claimant or his supporters have resorted to corruption, and to reject him if in its opinion he has, or the result has been materially affected by such villainy, the toleration of which means the death of free government.

What is the difference to the people of my State whether one claiming to be elected to the Senate from another secured his election by bribing his constituency in the primary or bribing them in the final election? Our peril from legislation in which he is a factor is as great in the one case as in the other. If Congress can not legislate to insure purity in primaries, there is all the more reason why the Senate should exclude a claimant whose election is tainted with fraud perpetrated in the primaries.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from California I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that we vote on the pending resolution not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I do not care to object to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed. I desire to submit a few observations on the question; and the danger that we usually encounter in entering into such unanimous-consent agreements is that some Senator will address himself to another subject, and may consume all the time, thereby preventing certain Senators who want to address themselves to the subject before the Senate from doing so.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, does the Senator from New Mexico have in mind those speeches that have been made to-day in behalf of the Republican Party, and made on the other side of the Chamber?

Mr. BRATTON. I appreciate the subtlety of the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire, and it is characteristic of him.

Mr. CURTIS. We can cure that objection by limiting the speeches of Senators to the subject, and also in time.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what is the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. The request is that the Senate, at the conclusion of its business to-day, take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that we have a vote on the pending resolution at not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow evening.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Kansas that it is absolutely impossible for some of us to be here as late as 5 o'clock to-morrow, and we want to vote on this matter. Would not the Senator consider this proposition, to have the Senate meet at an earlier hour and then agree to vote at not later than 2.30? Some of us have to leave at 3.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. At this time I object to any such arrangement.

Mr. WILLIS. There may be other objections. The Senator just files an objection without any consultation or discussion.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The proposition is such that I object to it at this moment.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well.

Mr. MOSES. Senators can fix any time they desire, as far as I am concerned, Mr. President, for voting to declare a seat vacant which has been empty since the 5th of December.

Mr. CURTIS. I submit my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BRUCE. I object. I do not want to have the discussion cut off yet a while.

Mr. WILLIS. Will not the Senator from Kansas submit a request that we shall agree to vote some time on the succeeding day?

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator from Kansas would submit a request like that submitted before, but leaving out the fixing of the time for a vote. I think we will reach a vote before 5 o'clock, without any limit being fixed.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator means a unanimous-consent request merely to recess at the conclusion of to-day's session?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am not going to object to that, but would not the Senator consider the convenience of some of us and make a request that a vote be had on the next day at 1 o'clock, say? Some of us have been pretty regular in our attendance on the sessions of the Senate, and we are greatly interested in taking a vote on this matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Quite a number of the Senators are in the same position the Senator from Ohio is in.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he means 1 o'clock day after to-morrow?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there will be any question about our reaching a vote by to-morrow at 5 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIS. The trouble is that some of us can not be here without exceeding inconvenience after 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There are some others of us who can not be here day after to-morrow. A number of Senators have indicated that they will not be in the Chamber day after to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me change my request. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS. That is good.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I was going to suggest that the Senate go on to-night until 7 o'clock, and before that hour has arrived we can probably reach a definite understanding as to the time when the debate shall be concluded.

I am not going to object to the Senator's request, but there are Senators here who want to leave to-morrow, and I would like to give them an opportunity to vote. But there has been a conference called, I understand, for 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why can we not agree to vote on this question day after to-morrow at 12 o'clock, or at 1 o'clock?

Mr. MOSES. As to that, I would like to say that the Senator from Connecticut informs me that a large number of Senators are going to be out of the city on Friday and Saturday, at Norfolk, inspecting the new aircraft carrier. I am not one of them, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, who looks at me so reproachfully.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; I look at the Senator admiringly, as I always do.

Mr. MOSES. I thank the Senator, and apologize for my strabismus.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Nebraska has suggested, I think the situation will take care of itself, but I for one am just a little dissatisfied with the way fixing a time for the close of discussion operates practically. All sorts of extraneous matters have been injected into the bowels of the debate going on to-day, and there is no assurance, if we fix some hour to-morrow, that Senators who desire to express their opinions upon the pending resolution will have an opportunity to do so. I think, as the Senator from Nebraska has suggested, that the situation will take care of itself.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that by unanimous consent we can restrict the speeches to the subject matter, and committee meetings and other appointments for to-morrow can be postponed until the next day, and we can meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Arkansas has just suggested that there is going to be a Democratic conference to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH. I do not see why we may not postpone it until day after to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, has the Senator from Arkansas any objection to our meeting at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I announced some time ago, during the course of the debate, that a conference of Democrats has been called for 10.30 to-morrow morning. I expect that conference to be held. The debate, however, might proceed from 11 o'clock, as I do not wish to be put in the position of vacating the notice for the conference.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I have not consulted the other Members, and if I speak contrary to their wishes they will make it known, but I want to give notice now, on behalf of the committee, that I shall ask the Senate to remain in session to-morrow until it has disposed of the Smith case.

I am going to make the further suggestion that, while the Senate should not vary its rule that there is a conclusive presumption that he who speaks is speaking to the question before the Senate, in view of the present situation I think Senators ought to forego their desire to speak on other subjects until this matter is disposed of. There is no way to enforce that, and I do not think we ought to enforce it, even by unanimous consent, but I do hope that it will be done. This matter has been debated at great length, and we all had expected it to be concluded to-day, but most of the day has been taken up by the discussion of foreign matter.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.), under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 19, 1928, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Out of the depths of our needs and hopes we ask of our Heavenly Father wisdom and guidance. May we put into each day some definite value; and being pure in our purpose, strong in our contentions for the right, we shall justify our calling. With certainty may we understand that our visions for our country are only worth while when they are made permanent and serve our fellow men. In the interest of the common life may our faith be translated into worthy zeal. Do Thou help us to the ministry of a well-ordered life; let all our forces be well drilled, well disciplined, and bless us with an evangelizing influence of chaste and winsome characters. Power is only hallowed when it works to hallowed ends. We pray in the name of the world's Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CUSTOMS APPEALS—REFERENCE OF BILL

Mr. VESTAL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6687) to change the title of the United States Court of Customs Appeals, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Patents, be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary, where I think it rightfully belongs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 6687, referred to the Committee on Patents, be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) authorizing an additional appropriation to be used for the memorial building provided for by a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War," approved June 7, 1924, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

THE ASWELL FARM RELIEF BILL

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks briefly on the question of farm legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his own remarks on farm legislation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 9278, a farm relief bill without the equalization fee, in this form because I am very eager to see helpful farm legislation speedily enacted by the Seventieth Congress. The United States Attorney General in the last Congress advised the President that the equalization fee contained in the Haugen bill is unconstitutional and the President could not, if he would, without repudiating his Attorney General, sign a similar bill containing the equalization fee. This situation plainly reveals that if any legislation containing the equalization fee should be passed, even by both Houses, there would be no farm relief legislation in this Congress.

Those gentlemen in and out of the Congress who persist in demanding the equalization fee or nothing are assuming full responsibility for the failure of the Seventieth Congress to enact farm legislation. The attention of the country should be called to this outstanding fact now.

I have cleared away all other differences and sharply drawn the issue as to the equalization fee. First, the members of the committee, then the Congress, will have a chance to vote directly for or against the equalization fee.

House bill 9278 is a modification of the bill introduced by Mr. HAUGEN in this Congress. The substantial difference between my bill and the Haugen bill is that it, unlike the Haugen bill, does not provide for any equalization fee or Federal tax on the producers, but in lieu thereof provides for the payment from the Treasury through a revolving fund of losses, costs, and charges arising under marketing agreements, which revolving fund also receives the profits from the sale of commodities. A total appropriation for the revolving fund of $400,000,000 is authorized. Only $250,000,000, however, of this sum is made available for the payment of such losses, costs, and charges. The remaining $150,000,000 is made available for loans to cooperative associations only.

My bill is also applicable to all agricultural commodities, as the Haugen bill is. Like the Haugen bill, it also further provides—

1. For the appointment by the President, without restriction, of the Federal farm board created therein.

2. For the creation of commodity advisory councils to assure complete representation of commodities in respect of which the board may enter into marketing agreements.

3. For loans from the revolving fund to cooperative associations for (1) controlling a surplus of any agricultural commodity, and (2) for the acquisition of facilities for storage. Loans for the latter purpose outstanding at any time are limited to an aggregate amount of $25,000,000. The aggregate amount of loans, however, for both purposes is restricted to $150,000,000 instead of $400,000,000 as provided in the Haugen bill. All such loans are to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

4. For the registration of clearing house associations established by cooperative associations which are adapted to effect the orderly production, distribution, and marketing of perishable agricultural commodities and of terminal market associations established by cooperative associations which are adapted to maintain public markets in distribution centers for the more orderly distribution and marketing of perishable agricultural commodities.

5. For the making by the board of marketing agreements with cooperative associations (whenever the board finds that a surplus of an agricultural commodity exists) for the withholding or the purchase, withholding, and disposal of any part of the surplus. The losses, if any, are to be paid out of the revolving fund, and profits, if any, are to be paid into such fund.

If H. R. 9278 is enacted into law and a board of proper caliber is appointed there would likely be profits instead of losses in marketing the cotton, tobacco, and rice surpluses, but we may expect losses in handling the wheat surplus. The passage of this bill putting the Federal Government behind the plan would, in my opinion, make it unnecessary for operations to be declared on most commodities because the moral effect of the Government's power would maintain just and fair prices to the producers.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees.

NORTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT, OKLAHOMA

Mr. DYER (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7011) to detach Okfuskee County from the northern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma and attach the same to the eastern judicial district of said State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill H. R. 7011, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Okfuskee County, of the northern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, detached from the northern judicial district and attached to and made a part of the eastern judicial district of said State.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this bill does one thing only, and that is to take a county out of one judicial district and put it in another district in the State of Oklahoma. The bill is recommended by the Attorney General, who said that its enactment into law will not only be for the convenience of the people having business in the courts but will save expense.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]. The gentleman from Oklahoma, his colleague [Mr. HOWARD], is interested in the proposed legislation, and would like a little time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the Sixty-eighth Congress I was the author of the measure creating the northern judicial district of Oklahoma. At that time we saw fit to include Okfuskee County in that district. We did so then because we thought it would bring into the district a kind of averaging up of the judicial business of that State, which is divided into three judicial districts. However, congressional ethics persuade me that the gentleman from the fourth congressional district of Oklahoma, [Mr. McKEOWN] is better informed as to the convenience and the necessities of the people in his district as to court jurisdiction, location, traveling conditions, and so forth, than I, and has a right to speak for them, and while personally I should prefer that this county remain in the northern judicial district, for that reason I shall not ask the House to defeat the measure.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HIGHWAY OVER GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT ALDERSON, W. VA.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9022) to authorize the town of Alderson, W. Va., to maintain a public highway upon the premises occupied by the Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill H. R. 9022. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, just what does this bill do to the Federal Government?

Mr. DYER. All that this bill does is to permit a right of way for a public highway across a certain Government reservation in the town of Alderson, W. Va.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it interfere with the Government's use of that property?

Mr. DYER. It does not.

Mr. BLANTON. Might it interfere with it in the future? Is there a recovery clause in the bill, whereby if it should interfere with the Government's use in the future the Government could get rid of this easement that it is proposed to grant?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. There is a provision in the bill which makes the whole grant revocable.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I shall not object, if that is the case.

Mr. DYER. The bill provides that it shall be entered into subject to and under such conditions and regulations as the Attorney General shall from time to time prescribe, and subject to revocation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and empowered to grant to the town of Alderson, W. Va., subject to and under such conditions and regulations as the Attorney General shall from time to time prescribe, and subject to revocation at such time as in his judgment the interests of the United States require it, the right to construct and maintain upon and across the eastern end of the premises occupied and used by and for the Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va., a public highway to connect the town of Alderson with the village of Glenray.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

APPROVAL OF MARSHALS' VOUCHERS

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9051.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of February 22, 1875, entitled "An act regulating fees and costs, and for other purposes," be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That the accounts of United States marshals, except the marshals of the United States courts in China and the Canal Zone, shall be rendered quarterly, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and transmitted to the Attorney General within 20 days after the close of each quarter. The said accounts shall be rendered in duplicate, but no signature shall be required on the duplicate vouchers. It shall be the duty of the marshal to retain in his office the duplicate accounts, where they shall be open to public inspection at all times. The accounts of United States commissioners shall be rendered quarterly, in duplicate, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and transmitted to the clerk of the United States district court for the district in which the commissioner resides, who shall file the duplicate in his office and transmit the original to the Attorney General. The approval of the court as to the accounts of marshals and commissioners shall not be required."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on July 1, 1928.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the necessity for changing the present law so as to permit the accounts to be rendered quarterly?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that is in order to facilitate speedy settlements. Monthly returns are unnecessary. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter on that point and ask that it be read.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there a good reason for it?

Mr. DYER. Yes. It is recommended by the Comptroller General and by the Attorney General.

Mr. BLANTON. There is one feature of this bill that I am sure ought not to appeal to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], and that is the clause next to the last, which provides that the approval of the judge shall not be necessary. That is a dangerous practice to establish with respect to the accounts of court officers.

I want to say to my friend that I remember distinctly that with respect to the account of a sheriff whom I considered honest, who waited on one of the courts in one of the counties where I held court, had mileage charged up in 17 different criminal cases for serving processes which he served on one man on one trip at one time, and under the law he was allowed mileage in only one case, whereas he had charged for 17 cases, because it happened that the process was in 17 cases, which process he served on one man at one time. If it had not been for the law which required the approval of the court, that sheriff would have collected 17 times the mileage that the law allowed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that when the original law was enacted we had no Comptroller General, so that now the approval of the court is only perfunctory and the account goes to the Comptroller General.

Mr. BLANTON. He is merely an additional check. It is not for the Comptroller General to send his inspectors to each of the 48 States to find out whether these accounts are correct and straight or not. It is the primary duty of the court to find that out. When a marshal sends up here charges for 17 trips the Comptroller General does not know and can not tell from the papers that he has made only one trip.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Comptroller General in a certain case sent out vouchers showing that a sheriff took a trolley car, and 17 cents were saved thereby.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but the judges ought to approve these accounts for our marshals. If we keep on, we are going to have a Comptroller General's office with a plant so big that the old Pension Bureau down here will not hold it. The Pension Bureau is full now of officials in the comptroller's office. Do you want to enlarge that tremendous building every year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Comptroller General has the facilities to check up all these vouchers.

Mr. BLANTON. No; he can simply O. K. them as a matter of course. In behalf of the taxpayers and in behalf of having honest and just accounts rendered by the various marshals of the United States, I am wondering whether my friend from Missouri might not have that clause stricken out. As it stands it would prevent the courts from approving the accounts. It ought to go out and the law stand as it is now.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. There may be a lot of force in what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says. The comptroller can not well go behind the face of the papers. He can not act upon anything except what appears on the face of the papers, and it is folly to think that he can check up the papers in the way it has been suggested here.

Mr. BLANTON. I will offer an amendment to strike out that paragraph.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentlemen from Texas to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 10, after the word "General," strike out the following: "The approval of the court as to the accounts of marshals and commissioners shall not be required."

Mr. BLANTON. Since the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is willing that an amendment be offered and my friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] believes the amendment is good I do not desire to occupy further time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a letter from the Attorney General he says the Comptroller General states that this requirement should be abolished and urges legislation to that end.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from New York this: That I know exactly how these accounts are prepared by these marshals. They are prepared just exactly like the accounts of sheriffs. On the face of them there is no one in Washington, 2,000 miles away, who could tell to save his soul whether the items are just or not. Usually the gentleman from New York is in favor of salutary provisions in the law to protect the people's Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think this will expedite the procedure and produce the very end that the gentleman from Texas and I are trying to achieve.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the Comptroller General's office is created for an entirely different purpose.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 39.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The doors were closed.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 192, not voting 87, as follows:

THE JUDICIAL CODE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 9049, a bill to amend section 227 of the Judicial Code.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before that consent is granted, will the Chair have the bill reported so we may know what it is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 227 of the Judicial Code be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 227. "The Public Printer shall turn over to the Attorney General, upon request, such reports as he may require in order to make the distribution authorized to be made by the Attorney General hereunder."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not—for information I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Except as to one very slight change this is practically the law that is in force to-day, is it not?

Mr. DYER. That is correct. There is only one change.

Mr. BLANTON. One official was not getting these reports?

Mr. DYER. No; one court.

Mr. BLANTON. One court, I meant. Why could not the great Judiciary Committee have brought in a four-line bill that would have given these reports to that court and not have to repeat the entire law over again in this five-page bill to make that change?

Mr. DYER. I will state to the gentleman that this bill was sent to the committee by the Attorney General, and it was introduced by the chairman of our committee. This is the usual way of amending such laws.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is just one of the ways of the Judiciary Committee. In the days of Jim Mann, when we had efficiency in most of the committees because he demanded it here on the floor, this law could have been changed with a four-line bill instead of a five-page bill.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON and Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I trust my friend from South Carolina will withdraw his demand for the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. I was about through and I was asking some pertinent questions. If the gentleman from South Carolina desires to cut off all inquiry I shall object.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not object to any pertinent inquiries being made, but if we are going to debate this matter let us debate it in the regular way and not by way of private conversation.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will withdraw his request for the regular order I can be through in a minute.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it for a minute, but we want to hear what is going on.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, my position is this, and I submit it to my colleagues and ask them whether or not it is common sense. The Judiciary Committee could have brought in a four-line bill granting this court these reports and it would have been just as effective as their five-page bill, which encumbers the RECORD and encumbers the law. That is all I have to say and I withdraw my reservation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DYER. If we did that it would be necessary to look through a number of statutes to find the law governing a very simple matter, whereas if you put it all together, it is very easy.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. This is a procedure I think we should follow in all such legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the rereference of the bill H. R. 2244, a private Spanish War pension bill, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have the bill read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSIT OF FEES, ETC., PAID TO UNITED STATES MARSHALS

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9052) to amend section 6 of the act of May 28, 1896.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, effective July 1, 1928, so much of section 6 of the act of May 28, 1896, chapter 252, as requires United States marshals to pay to the clerks of United States courts having jurisdiction all fees and emoluments authorized by law to be paid to United States marshals be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and, effective July 1, 1928, all such fees and emoluments so paid to United States marshals shall be deposited by said marshals in accordance with the provisions of section 3621 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 5 of the said act of May 28, 1896.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY] to make a statement about this bill.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 6 of the act of 1896 in order to authorize United States marshals to report direct to the United States Treasury all fees collected. Under present law the marshal reports to the clerk of the court, and the clerk then reports to the Treasury of the United States. This is to simplify the matter and is recommended by the Comptroller General. It is in the interest of uniformity. I will be very glad to answer any questions on the proposition that anyone may care to submit.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I only wish to take this opportunity to make the suggestion that when a bill is stated to have the approval of the Comptroller General it seems to me the statement of the comptroller ought to be included in the report, the same as the statement of the Attorney General.

Mr. HICKEY. The statement is included in the report, if the gentleman will read it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I mean the letter from the Comptroller General.

Mr. HICKEY. I call the gentleman's attention to the comptroller's language on the first page of the report. This is very clear and shows that he approves this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. It simply says that the Comptroller General recommends that it be abolished.

Mr. HICKEY. No; it states that the Comptroller General says the procedure prescribed—the present procedure—is cumbersome. It is included in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the safeguarding of the taxpayers of this Nation, there has been for years in force and effect in the law certain double checks on officials who handle money for the people. These double checks are in the interest of honesty in public affairs and for the benefit of the Treasury, the replenishment of which comes from the people's pockets only through taxes.

Here is another effort on the part of Government officials to take away these double checks. For 31 years it has been the law that when a marshal receives money—and he does receive much money all the time—he shall report it to the clerk of the court. There is one check-up by an officer who knows all the facts surrounding the collection of that money and he is the only one, besides the marshal, who knows it.

After the clerk receives the money he reports to the Treasurer of the United States and the Comptroller General has a second check-up to see that it has been honestly reported. This is in the interest of the taxpayers of the United States Government.

This bill would take one of those checks away and would change the law which has been in force and effect for 31 years and make it unnecessary for the marshal to report his collections to the clerk, when, as I said a moment ago, the clerk is the only one who knows anything about the transaction; and the Republican administration in power will vote to take away this first check and depend on the Comptroller General 2,000 miles away, here in Washington, to uncover something that appears all right on the face of the paper.

By a small majority here a moment ago the Republican side of this House voted to take off the check of the trial judge's approval of the marshal's account, a law that has been in force and effect in this Nation for years. Why did they do it? There are influential Members of the House on the Republican side who have close friends who are United States marshals. These United States marshals did not want this check from the judge, and the only argument I heard here from the floor was that the United States judges did not do their duty, that the approval was a perfunctory matter; and, forsooth, because they did not do their duty they would amend the law, and you did vote to amend it.

Now, I am in favor of protecting the American people by proper check-ups.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman talking about the bill now before the House or the one that passed a little while ago?

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the bill which passed in the House a few minutes ago, and its companion sister bill now before us, which the gentleman hopes to pass and will pass.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman has made no particular reference to this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from Connecticut has so many responsibilities and so much comes in his ears that he can not hear what takes place. I said this was a bill to relieve the marshals from reporting to the clerks of the court the money they collected.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Texas can be heard above all the din that takes place.

Mr. BLANTON. I am speaking in behalf of the taxpayers, and I want to check up on these marshals who handle these public funds.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, who generally by word of mouth is for the people, but when he comes to vote, votes with the machine. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Texas states an inaccuracy. I perhaps may have been mistaken, but I voted with the gentleman on the standing vote and on the roll call. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. But he was not able to carry the floor leader and the Republican machine with him.

Mr. CRAMTON. The purpose I had in rising was to call attention to the fact that, while I am not informed as to the vote on the roll call, on the standing vote, neither his side of the aisle nor mine supported the gentleman from Texas and myself.

Mr. BLANTON. About 150 Members voted to keep the check on the United States marshals' accounts.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I will say that the law provides that the report of the marshals must be made to the Attorney General, and he must in turn submit the report to the Comptroller General, and then they have examiners who go out at different times through the marshal's office and make investigations.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that it has been the law for 31 years that the marshals must submit to the clerk of the court their reports of all money collected by them, and it is the clerk of a court only who knows whether the report is correct.

Mr. DYER. The clerk does not go over the account; he receives it and files it.

Mr. BLANTON. If the clerk knew the report was dishonest, he would report it to the judge.

These bureau chiefs in this bureaucratic Government, whenever they want to change a law and make it a little more liberal for them in the way they handle the public funds, they prepare bills and send them to the committee, and the committee reports them without looking into them and finding out their full import. The time has come when it ought to stop. The committees of Congress ought to inspect more carefully the bills when they come before the committee. When the Secretary of the Navy wants to give a limousine to every officer in the Navy and sends a bureau naval officer with that bill to the clerk of the committee, the clerk of that committee ought not to be allowed to put the name of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] on it and drop it in the basket without his consent.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Let me say to the gentleman that some of the strongest men in the House on both sides of the aisle are members of the Judiciary Committee and, as I understand, the report in this case is a unanimous report. One of the best men, one of the strongest men in the House, the gentleman's own colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who is the ranking member on the minority side, was one of the members who voted to report the bill. It seems to me the gentleman is making rather a strong statement in this inveighing against these very good men.

Mr. BLANTON. The trouble is this: There are only 24 hours in a day, and when you attend all the social functions that are given, get to bed somewhere during the middle of the night, sometimes sleep late the next morning, get your breakfast late, and by the time you have opened up the mail you do not take the time to look over bills carefully.

Mr. DENISON. Is the gentleman referring to his colleague, Mr. SUMNERS?

Mr. BLANTON. I am referring to most of the 435 Members of the House of Representatives whose time each day is limited to 24 hours. They do not take the time necessary to examine these bills carefully.

Mr. MICHENER. Did the gentleman have special reference to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SUMNERS?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], my colleague, is just as honorable and just as conscientious as any man in this House, but he does not take the time to read all of these bills that come even before his own committee and look into them carefully and give them proper study. These bills that change the law and take the check up off officials who handle the public funds ought to come from the committees of Congress and not from bureaus down here, and bureaucratic heads. That is all that I have to say about it. Oh, you will pass the bill with a machine vote; there is no stopping it now. But some day it will stop, because the people are waking up.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] might leave the impression that this bill and the bill previously passed eliminates one of the checks on accounts for marshals, and that the committee is lowering the bars as to audit and supervision of marshals' accounts. As a matter of fact, the contrary is true. This bill simply provides for the deposit of marshals' funds.

We are bound to have a great many bills from various departments changing the system of accounting since the creation of the office of the Comptroller General. Prior to the time that the office of the Comptroller General was created, who acts as the agent of Congress, who is our auditor, each department had its own auditor. Of course, the system became complicated and cumbersome by reason of the various systems of audits within the various departments. The reason for having the clerk take over the accounts of the marshal is now no longer necessary. With our present system of audit and bonding of marshals there is no need for an additional account.

At the time when the law was enacted requiring the supervision of the clerk over the accounts of the marshal was necessary, we had no Comptroller General. Since the creation of the office of the Comptroller General we are trying to establish a uniform system of accounting in all of the departments of the Government. In the first place, to have the disbursing officer, or the officer handling the funds, directly accountable to the head of his department first, and under the supervision and the audit of the Comptroller General.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In just a moment. In this instance the marshal's accounts are first submitted to the Attorney General under section 317 of Title V of the Code of Laws of the United States. There is the first audit. The clerk is under the jurisdiction of the Attorney General, so that the perfunctory audit of the court as in the previous bill repealed is no longer necessary because the account is first audited by the Attorney General and then under section 81 of title 31 of the United States Code of Laws the Attorney General must submit the accounts of United States marshals and other disbursing officers of the department to the General Accounting Office, which is the Comptroller General. As to the funds themselves, it goes without saying that there is no need of a transfer of funds from marshal to clerk and from clerk to the Treasury. So that we are not in any degree letting down or lessening the audit we have had heretofore, but we are simply establishing in the Department of Justice a uniform system of audit and accounting. Moreover, besides the account being submitted to the Attorney General and then audited by the Comptroller General, under section 84 of title 31 of the Code of Laws of the United States the Attorney General has his own inspectors checking up the accounts of the various disbursing and financial officers in his department.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. To show the gentleman how far these marshals and their accounts and the clerks are from the Comptroller General here in Washington, if you start now to go to Texas you will land in Texarkana day after to-morrow morning, and after you reach there you will have to go 900 miles west from Texarkana, Tex., to reach El Paso, Tex. Does the gentleman think that the Comptroller General knows as much about the collections that the marshal makes in El Paso, and as much about his report concerning the collections there, as the clerk in El Paso would know?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The clerk does not follow the marshal; he does not gumshoe the marshal. He simply takes the same accounts that now come to the head of the department.

Mr. BLANTON. Every collection that the marshal makes is made on a process that the clerk himself issues, and the clerk is the only one who knows whether those collections are honestly reported or not. The Comptroller General here, several thousand miles away, is not in a position to go behind the face of the return.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Texas, let me say that I do not speak for the organized Republican Party.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman is going right along with the organization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Only when they are right, and then I stand by them.

Mr. BLANTON. Since he has gotten his committee assignments back.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me assure the gentleman from Texas that he is not the only one who reads all of the bills and reports. There are other Members of the House who do that beside himself, and I submit it is hardly fair to take the floor and imply that he, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], is the only person in the House who has read a bill and who knows what it is all about. In this instance, as in many other instances, the gentleman reads all of the bills and talks about all of the bills.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not read all of the bills. I read only those bills that are reported from committees. There are thousands of bills that I do not read, that do not come out of a committee. They are not dangerous. But as soon as a bill is reported then it becomes dangerous and I study all such bills carefully.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided.

Mr. BLANTON (during the division). Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 318, nays 11, not voting 104, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL CODE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5623) to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section, to be numbered 274D.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it on the Union Calendar?

Mr. DYER. It is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Judicial Code approved March 3, 1911, is hereby amended by adding after section 274C thereof a new section, to be No. 274D, as follows:

"SEC. 274D. (1) In cases of actual controversy in which, if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction, the said courts upon petition shall have jurisdiction to declare rights and other legal relations on request of interested parties for such declarations whether or not further relief is or could be prayed, and such declarations shall have the force of final decree and be reviewable as such.

"(2) Further relief based on declaratory decree may be granted whenever necessary or proper. The application shall be by petition to a court having jurisdiction to grant the relief. If the application be deemed sufficient, the court shall, on reasonable notice, require any adverse party, whose rights have been adjudicated by the declaration, to show cause why further relief should not be granted forthwith.

"(3) When a declaration of right or the granting of further relief based thereon shall involve the determination of issues of fact triable by a jury, such issues may be submitted to a jury in the form of interrogatories, with proper instructions by the court, whether a general verdict be required or not.

"(4) The Supreme Court may adopt rules for the better enforcement and regulation of this provision."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that this bill is fresh in the minds of the Members of the House. The bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on three several and successive occasions, and it passed the House last year by unanimous consent.

The purport of the bill is to simplify and expedite the administration of justice. It is not a new measure, except here. Twenty-some States of the Union already have a similar or somewhat similar law. It is in wholesome practice in England, and has been for 35 years; and more interesting still, it has been in operation in Scotland for over 400 years, and some of the ablest jurists of England commented long before the adoption of the measure into their system of laws on the neglect of England to adopt the practice of Scotland. Several of the nations on the Continent have adopted similar laws.

In the field of law as in the field of medicine there may be preventive remedies. We reach it now in equity and in law sometimes by demurrers. This bill is not radical at all. Personally I would like to see it more extensive in its application.

May I give an illustration? Suppose, for instance, there is a suit involving on one side a husband and wife against another party; one of the parties arises and says, "I desire to file a petition to determine the validity of this marriage, for my contention is that it is not a valid marriage." The other party consents, and then this vital intermediary question must be first determined. To go through the whole case, based upon a validity of the marriage, and then after the long trial to move an arrest of judgment or the setting aside of the verdict is a waste of time and money.

Again, a suit is brought upon a contract. One party takes one view of its construction and the other party takes an opposite view. It is manifest that one or the other construction of the contract would bring about an entirely different result. Therefore the parties request the court to pass upon the precise question as to what that contract means, what is its true construction. Thereby the case may be speedily terminated or it may go forward under more precise and defined lines.

This bill did not meet with opposition in the House the last time, and it is manifest we should do something to-day to make it an available method of simplifying and facilitating the administration of law. Not only do suitors desire this remedy, but it is in the interest of the administration of justice throughout the country.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. With pleasure.

Mr. DENISON. I am interested in this matter and did not discover it was on the calendar until just a short time ago. For information, may I ask whether or not in these proceedings for a declaratory judgment the court enters into a consideration of the facts?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The court may consider the fact as well as the law, and the court may direct the trial of a fact by a jury. The court has that power. We provide in the bill that the Supreme Court may make rules and regulations for a more efficient administration of the procedure.

I may say further that the courts are not likely to take radical steps in administering this remedy. I think they will go step by step until the efficiency of the procedure is thoroughly demonstrated. That has been the history of its progress and success where employed.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Can one party take a controversy into court without the consent of the other?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No. It provides for the consent of the parties.

Mr. DENISON. Both parties?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; both parties.

Mr. NEWTON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. This applies only to actual controversies?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes. The gentleman is a lawyer and I anticipate what is in his mind. He probably has in mind the Michigan case. Michigan had a statute covering this subject, and the courts declared it unconstitutional upon the ground that it did not apply to actual controversies. So this bill bridges that aspect of the procedure by applying the remedy to actual controversies.

Mr. NEWTON. In the Michigan case there was a dissenting opinion, which has met with the approval of some lawyers throughout the country. However, it seems to me the committee has done well to confine this initial effort to actual controversies. Let me ask the gentleman this further question: How is the court going to protect itself so as to be sure that the controversies are real and actual instead of mooted questions?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I should think that when a controversy is actually pending, and a petition is presented to the court for a declaratory judgment, that petition must be consented to by the parties and that sufficient facts or law must be developed to assure the court that an actual controversy existed. The court must of necessity satisfy itself upon this point.

Mr. NEWTON. I can imagine a case where parties might be able to get up a moot question and put it in such form as to make it appear there was an actual controversy when, as a matter of fact, there was not. That might be done unless the court should be rather strict in handling such matters.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will realize that we must rely on the courts to make the discovery and to take proper action.

The concluding paragraph of the bill provides:

The Supreme Court may adopt rules for the better enforcement and regulation of this provision.

This, I think, is a wholesome provision.

Mr. NEWTON. Now, as to the controversies submitted, upon their decision being rendered the question then is res adjudicata for all time to come?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is final as to that matter, with the right of review by the appellate tribunal, just as a final decree or judgment of the court is now so reviewable.

Mr. NEWTON. So it would be the same as in any other law suit?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; as to that particular fact or law, or aspect of the controversy submitted.

Mr. NEWTON. Whatever has been determined in the proceeding.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The first section of the bill states:

In cases of actual controversy in which, if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction, the said courts upon petition shall have jurisdiction to declare rights and other legal relations on request of interested parties.

Does the gentleman construe that to mean that the request must be made by both parties?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I so construe it.

Mr. NEWTON. There seems to be quite a difference of opinion among the members of the committee on that point, and I wanted to get the gentleman's idea.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Would it not be clearer if we inserted in line 10, before the word "interested," the word "all," and make it read "on request of all interested parties"? Would not that cover it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no objection to that. Personally, I would not confine it to the concurrence of the parties. I would leave it to the court, upon the application of either party, to decide the question.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me we should introduce some further definition here, otherwise the language will be ambiguous. We either ought to say "all interested parties," "any interested party," "either interested party," or use some other definite description of the party or parties. The language as it stands leaves the meaning ambiguous.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The bill, I may state, was not drawn by me. As I recall, the bill was drawn by a special committee of the American Bar Association.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, I find from reading the testimony of Mr. McChesney, who, I understand, represented the American Bar Association——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON (continuing). That he construed it to apply to both parties or to all parties, and I think it ought to be made plain in the language used.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. STOBBS. May I call the gentleman's attention to a discussion in the committee on this particular aspect of the bill? Mr. Henry W. Taft, of New York, when he was asked the question as to whether or not both parties must agree, stated as follows:

I have supposed—now, I may be wrong in this, but I have supposed that it was coercive; that is to say, that either party might bring the other party into court. Perhaps this bill is not definite in making that clear; since you speak of it, I am inclined to think it is not particularly clear. But my impression of the use of this judgment in other jurisdictions has been that it is compulsory.

We were discussing this question in the committee and this was the opinion of Mr. Taft in his statement given to the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have no hesitancy in saying I wish it were coercive, but when you use the word "parties," it would embrace all parties to the controversy.

Mr. STOBBS. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be called into effect at the request of any one interested party?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do. That is my personal conviction.

Mr. STOBBS. Rather than all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; then you leave it for the court to determine. We must trust to the courts, and they are not likely to do this unless they believe it should be done, and that the fact and law and nature of the controversy amply justify it.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. I understand the word "declaration" is used in the bill and I presume this bill will be called the declarative judgment bill. Does this bill take in all that is generally known as declarative judgments in this sense, that where two parties to a contract have difficulties in determining what their rights are, they then have the right under this bill to go into court and have their rights determined?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not clear under this bill. In many States they can, but this bill confines jurisdiction to actual controversies and not potential controversies. We may reach that in the development of the practice, but it does not apply now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is not the object of the bill to discourage and prevent as far as possible a large volume of litigation?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; and also to expedite and simplify the procedure in litigation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Upon that theory will this not be conducive to increasing litigation? If either party during a preliminary stage of a controversy can bring the matter into court, and thereafter there may be further litigation before the rights of the parties are determined, would you not have double the volume of litigation, because there would be a lawsuit declaring the rights under a contract, and then after the rights are determined there would be further litigation? Would it not be better, as suggested by some of the gentlemen here, that this right could only be exercised when both parties were willing to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court? Otherwise it seems to me you will have an increased volume of litigation, which would be what we might call litigation of a premature character.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It would not be any more premature than a demurrer or an injunction.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I want to direct my colleague's attention to certain language in section 274D. My colleague will recall that when the bill was under consideration there was one proposition to limit this remedy to those situations where suits were pending; and another was to permit, for instance, a matter being submitted to the court when there was a difference of opinion between the parties to a contract, for instance, as to what was the proper construction of that contract.

It seems to me probably true that the committee undertook to effectuate the latter, because the bill reads:

In cases of actual controversy, in which if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction—

And so forth. Is it not true that it would be possible for interested parties, in a difference of opinion with reference to the proper construction of a contract, to submit that question to the court, no suit having been brought involving the general matter in controversy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman means, does the bill contemplate an interpretation of a contract in the absence of a suit?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The bill is intended to apply to "actual controversies," in suits pending, for the reason that the courts of Michigan had held that in the absence of an "actual controversy" the procedure was not constitutional, and we did not wish to run any risk.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that some change of language in the section should be made because of the words "if suit were brought"?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The language is "in cases of actual controversy in which, if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction"—that seems to refer to cases in which the courts of the United States have jurisdiction.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield? I am in doubt as to what this bill is. In New York State in the surrogate's court, having jurisdiction over wills, an executor or administrator under the law, if he has any doubt as to the meaning of a clause in a will, has a right to go to the surrogate and ask the surrogate how he will interpret a certain passage of the will so that he can be certain that his operations under the will are proper. Now, by analogy, suppose A has a contract with B, and he does not know what he might do under that contract, and B differs with him. Now, may he go to the court under this bill and say here is my contract with B; B disagrees with me, and I want the court to determine the controversy?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the proceedings or pleadings present the question he could. In the case of the will the gentleman speaks of I do not know the practice in New York, but in my State for a long time, where the construction of a will is involved, a court of equity will take jurisdiction and determine the precise question. Perhaps the law courts in some jurisdictions may do likewise.

Mr. CELLER. I am only arguing by analogy when I offer the New York practice as to wills—just trying to make my position clear. The gentleman says if there is such a controversy between A and B upon a contract they can go to a Federal court and have their rights determined.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the court has jurisdiction and the question is properly presented.

Mr. CELLER. But I mean before actual default can either go to the court for the interpretation of the contract? Can either party go into court and say we want this controversy determined?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would not like to answer categorically.

Mr. CELLER. I think a definite conclusion should be reached by the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My own idea is that what the gentleman desires is one of the great objects of declaratory judgments; whether this bill will give all the relief in that direction or not there is some doubt, but it leads in the proper direction.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman's statement is going to create a doubt in the minds of the judges because the gentleman knows that when statutes are interpreted the congressional debates are looked up and judges in a way are aided in construing statutes by what we say here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can only say that the bill means actual controversies in court. It does not mean a controversy not in court.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will yield.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What is the status of a case under actual controversy upon which a petition may be filed?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I could not tell the gentleman. One case might not conform to the petition or procedure and another might. All that is to be determined by the judge in the individual controversy.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What I desire to bring out is: Can a petition be filed on the filing of a bill, or must it be filed when the issue is joined?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The petition must be filed after the case or controversy is in court.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That does not go far enough. It would be docketed and in court on the filing of the bill or declaration. Can a declaration be filed before issue is joined by the filing of some pleading by the defendant?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should think the controversy must be ready for hearing in some form, or at whatever stage it may have progressed with, this intermediary procedure may be presented and determined. That is, the court may take it up for consideration. It should be repeated that the Supreme Court is enabled under this bill to adopt a procedure for this particular remedy.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. Kentucky has a declaratory judgment law, and it has been very beneficial. It is employed at the instance of one party alone.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. And in addition to that, going further than the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] suggested, one party may want to know in the case of a will what his interest in the property is, and it may be a remainder interest. There may be no actual controversy for years, yet he is interested to know what his interest is, because he may want to sell. He is permitted to go into court and find out. If the gentleman will pardon the presumption, I think the bill would be better if it would specify at least at the instance of any one party.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I agree with the gentleman in that, and so far as I am individually concerned I will vote for such an amendment.

Mr. STOBBS. I am going to offer such an amendment.

Mr. GILBERT. In Kentucky it has occurred where one party is very much interested in knowing, while the other is not interested and will not come into court.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the gentleman from Kentucky states a case not in court at the time.

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill may not go so far as that.

Mr. GILBERT. He may have an opportunity to sell his interest in the property.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a potential case. There was much opposition to that. Michigan declared the suggestion of the gentleman, which I think is most beneficial, to be invalid, and we want to avoid any constitutional negations of the law.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me state a practical case. Suppose John Smith is a life tenant in possession of a tract of land, and that property is to go to Bill Jones at his death, provided Bill Jones is then alive, and if not, then to some one else; and Bill Jones and John Smith go into court on one of these declaratory propositions, on the question of the rights of the parties in that land, and a decision is had. That decision may be detrimental to the interests of the ultimate remaindermen, who are not there. How will they be affected by it? That is a practical question that the bar has to look into before starting this matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a question for a judicial action, and a similar question may arise upon any final judgment or decree. The gentleman knows as much about that as I do.

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, is it not possible that the ultimate remainder man may be prejudiced, bound, and barred by a judgment in a case to which he was never a party?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; it is possible, and also he may be mightily benefited.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the case the gentleman just stated, he could not come into court because no right of action would have occurred.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose there was a dispute as to the possession of property between the life tenant and this potential first remainder man. There would be a right there, and they could go into court mighty quick.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They could not do it.

Mr. STEVENSON. But suppose the life tenant's right was disputed by the remainder man?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They would decide the right of the life tenant and nobody else.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me this legislation is very, very desirable, and, as the gentleman from Virginia has pointed out, it is in the nature of preventive medicine. There was an honest difference of opinion in the committee, and there may be an honest difference of opinion among the Members of this House as to whether or not this declaratory judgment feature ought to be invoked at the request of all the interested parties or by any one individual. That is just a matter of a difference of opinion. In the hearings before the committee Mr. McChesney, as has already been pointed out, said he understood from the way this bill was drawn, that it would require the consent of all the interested parties, but Henry W. Taft, of New York, at a previous hearing on this same bill, said he thought it ought to be invoked at the request of any one individual party; in other words, it ought to be coercive, and as the gentleman from Kentucky has pointed out, that is the way it has worked out in his particular State. Personally, I favor this provision being invoked at the request of any one individual party who is involved in the controversy. To answer the objection made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], I would say that if a party presents a petition to the court, the court under that petition, if any one party has that right, takes that matter under consideration. Of course, the court is going to have notices issued to all the interested parties, so that they may be heard. When a man files a petition the court will order all of the interested parties into court so that their rights may be adjudicated and they may be heard at that time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I understand, it is contemplated that the question to be presented is always a pertinent and relative question.

Mr. STOBBS. Surely.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If that is true, what objection can there be to the court taking cognizance of the proposition at the instance of one party, even though the other party may be opposed to it?

Mr. STOBBS. I see none. I propose to offer an amendment to insert the words "any of the interested parties." Now, just a word as to why I believe any one party should have the right to request an adjudication or consideration of this matter. There are always two elements involved in any business agreement controversy. There is the element of liability and the element of damage. Lots of times there is an honest difference between two people as to what a business agreement, which they have entered into between themselves, actually means. If one of those parties—who may, as a matter of fact, be the one who is least well off financially—wants to have determined, before he goes ahead and performs his part of the contract, just exactly what the contract means, if you leave it that both parties must agree he could not get a determination or construction of the contract as a matter of right, whereas if you leave it that any one of those parties may request the court to take jurisdiction, then the man who may be the least well off financially can go to the court and simply say, "I want this court to determine the question as to what this contract means before I go ahead and perform my part of it or incur any liability under it." Now, that is a plain, simple, business proposition. So he goes to court and says, "I want the court to interpret this contract at the very outset," and the other side, then, has got to come in. There is no reason why they should not be compelled to come in. Then they both have their rights heard in court and have a decision as to what that contract actually means.

After the court has said what that contract means, then each party can go ahead and perform their respective obligations or duties under the contract. Perhaps the best illustration as to why you ought to allow one party to come in is the question of the construction of wills. Suppose I am the executor of an estate and I am supposed to carry out the terms of a will. The provisions of that instrument are far from being clear, and some of the beneficiaries come to me and say, "This will means so-and-so." Other beneficiaries will say, "This will means so-and-so." I simply look at it and say, "I believe it means so-and-so." If I say, "Let us have the court construe this," some of these people, who are playing the litigation game, say, "We will not agree to come in on a construction of this proposition," and if that should happen, where am I left?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. STOBBS. If it is left that any one party can go before the court, then I, as the executor, will go before the court and say, "I do not agree with you beneficiaries on this, so you will have to go into court on it."

Mr. DYER. How can you go into a Federal court in a will case?

Mr. STOBBS. I suppose a will case is not the best illustration, but it illustrates the declaratory judgment feature in a State court.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman was discussing the question I wanted to ask. In a will case the parties are all in court?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. And that is a State court proposition?

Mr. STOBBS. But it illustrates the declaratory judgment provision.

Mr. DOWELL. But in the case of a contract, suppose there is no real controversy as to the meaning of the contract, and then suppose one of the parties who desire to construe it favorably to himself says to the others, "Unless you agree to my version of this contract I shall bring this before the court and have a suit to determine the proper construction of this contract," would he not have a lever upon those who did not want to go into court for a construction, by the threat that unless they conceded his construction of it they would be brought into court for a determination by the court. In other words, could he in any way influence the construction of the contract to his own advantage?

Mr. STOBBS. My answer to the gentleman from Iowa is that the procedure on these declaratory judgments is only invoked where there is an actual controversy, and that means no moot question; and if any one party sought to invoke the use of the court and the court afterwards determined there was no real controversy, but it was done purely for purposes of delay and provoking litigation, the court would deal accordingly; in fact, the court would not have any jurisdiction, if there were no controversy involved, under the phraseology of the bill. This is the way it has been considered and construed in all the States. In other words, it must not be a moot question, but must be a real, actual controversy before you have any right to come into court.

Mr. ABERNETHY and Mr. HOCH rose.

Mr. STOBBS. I yield first to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have been on my feet for 15 minutes and I think I shall have to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. STOBBS. I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina. I am sorry.

Mr. ABERNETHY. No; the gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Kansas. I withdraw any point of no quorum.

Mr. STOBBS. All right. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas and then will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOCH. If I understand the gentleman correctly with reference to the case of a contract, his view of this language is that if there were a substantial controversy as to the meaning of a contract, this procedure might be availed of even though there were no allegations of a breach of the contract; that is to say, there is no existing cause of action upon which a hearing could be had at the time; but there is a substantial controversy as to the meaning of the contract.

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. In that case they could still come in and invoke this procedure.

Mr. STOBBS. Absolutely.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. There might be a controversy between the parties as to what certain words of a contract meant, and in anticipation of a breach of the contract, they could come into court and have that controversy determined.

Mr. STOBBS. That is exactly it. They determine the question of liability before they incur any damage on one side or the other.

Mr. CELLER. I take it the gentleman's view is that this should be as in equity cases, either party or any party interested can come in and invoke the aid of the court, and then the court can draw in everybody who is interested.

Mr. STOBBS. That is exactly my opinion.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I certainly will, with pleasure.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does not the gentleman think if we leave this procedure to any one party to the controversy we will have to increase the number of our courts very largely on account of the amount of litigation that will be brought about by these controversies? In view of the congested dockets we have now, does not the gentleman think that leaving this to either one of the parties will make it necessary for us to increase the number of judges very largely?

Mr. STOBBS. I think it will work exactly the other way, because you are going to shut off litigation. You can determine the rights of the parties beforehand and thereby you are going to save a lot of expensive suits.

There is one other thought in connection with will cases. Of course, will cases ordinarily are settled and determined in the State courts, but there are cases where will cases come into the Federal courts, I believe, where there is a question of diverse citizenship, and this question would then be involved; and if there is any one class of cases where any one individual ought to have the right to go before the court, without the consent of all the rest of the parties, and ask to have a construction of an instrument before there is anything done by the parties on one side or the other, and to save litigation and expense to the parties, it is in will cases, and that is exactly what this legislation would allow you to do in respect of such a case in the Federal court.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. You can do that in every case in the country now. The courts now recognize the right of either party to bring suits to construe wills without any legislation of this kind.

Mr. STOBBS. There is not any question but that this bill allows it, and it would be possible under this legislation to do that in the Federal courts.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; but I say the courts, wherever they have jurisdiction to construe wills, now do that very thing.

Mr. STOBBS. In the Federal courts to-day?

Mr. DENISON. If they have jurisdiction to try will cases at all.

Mr. STOBBS. Then this legislation is not going to do any harm.

Mr. DENISON. I mean it is not necessary in order to permit the courts to construe a will where there is a dispute about it, because that can be done now.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. It appears to me we would have to have a great increase in the number of our judges because of the increased legislation, because before a judge could determine the question upon which the petition is based he would practically have to require the same evidence he would require in a court trial.

Mr. STOBBS. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin appreciate the fact that all the judge is going to construe is a written instrument, say a contract, and he is not going to hear any witnesses. Therefore if he construes that written instrument and decides it to be such and such a thing, then you have avoided all the trouble and expense of bringing your witnesses before the court to try out that same question later on. You are saving trouble rather than making trouble in the courts.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It seems to me there is a confusion as to the meaning of the word "party" in this bill.

A party to an action or suit is one who is directly interested in the subject-matter in issue; who has a right to make a defense, control the proceedings, or appeal from the judgment. (United States v. Henderlong (U. S.) 102 Fed. 2, 4; In re Duchess of Kingston, 20 Howell, St. Tr. 538; Hunt v. Haven, 52 N. H. 162, 169; Robbins v. City of Chicago, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 657, 672, 18 L. Ed. 427; Green v. Bogue, 15 Sup. Ct. 975, 985, 158 U. S. 478, 39 L. Ed. 1061; Theller v.

Hershey (U. S.) 89 Fed. 575, 576; Cullen v. Woolverton, 47 Atl. 626, 627, 65 N. J. Law 279; Hodde v. Susan, 58 Tex. 389, 393; Haney v. Brown (Tex.) 46 S. W. 55, 57; Bealor v. Hahn, 19 Atl. 74, 76, 132 Pa. 242; Walker v. City of Philadelphia, 45 Atl. 657, 195 Pa. 168, 78 Am. St. Rep. 801; State ex rel. Kane v. Johnson (Mo.) 25 S. W. 855, 857 (citing Greenl. Ev. 535); City of Springfield v. Plummer, 89 Mo. App. 515, 531; Boles v. Smith, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 105, 107; Wheeler v. Towns, 43 N. H. 56, 57.)

A party is ordinarily one who has or claims an interest in the subject of an action or proceeding instituted to afford some relief to the one who sets the law in motion against another person or persons. Interest or the claim of interest is the test as to the right to be a party to legal proceedings almost without exception. Hughes v. Jones (22 N. E. 446, 448; 116 N. Y. 67; 5 L. R. A. 637; 15 Am. St. Rep. 386).

Interest means concern, advantage, good; share, portion, part, or participation. Fitch v. Bates (N. Y.), 11 Barb, 471, 473 (citing Webster).

So that the bill as now framed permits the one party to commence proceedings for a declaratory judgment. A plaintiff in an action need not consult the defendant; he serves papers and that brings the defendant into court. When a party wants a declaratory judgment, if there is an actual issue he serves the other party with papers and brings him into court.

The illustration presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] shows what the bill will do. I do not agree with the gentleman from Virginia that it is necessary to have an action pending in court. You can have a declaratory judgment before you get into court. That is the essence of this bill. In fact, the purpose of obtaining a declaratory judgment, as I understand it, is to avoid suit, avoid litigation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] concerning a hypothetical case, a controversy over the purchase of cloth, whether it is worsted or wool. Now, to bring this under the provisions of the bill you would have to state the facts and the actual controversy, and the court determines first whether it is an actual controversy and the meaning of the contract. If you fail to show an actual controversy you are thrown out of court on demurrer or a motion to dismiss. You first state the facts. Assume the facts as presented by the gentleman from New York. A sells to B a thousand yards of blue serge worsted cloth and the contract provides that B shall have the right to check up on the color and shape, and while he checks up he finds the cloth is not made in accordance with the provisions, or what he believes are the provisions, of the contract. B may call A into court and ask the court to declare whether it shall be worsted or wool, or what.

The purpose is not to put A to the expense of manufacturing all the cloth and taking the chances whether it is in accordance with the contract or not. It is not the purpose to put B to the risk of waiting until delivery of the cloth is made and then finding himself with a consignment of goods he did not order and can not use.

So that if you have a contract, if you have a controversy and the court has jurisdiction you can bring in the interested party. As I understand the purpose of declaratory judgment it should not be necessary to obtain the consent of the other party.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. NEWTON. Was the language in the bill taken from any State statute?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it is very much like some of the State statutes.

Mr. NEWTON. What I am getting at is this, if the language in lines 9 and 10, on request of the interested parties for such declaration—if that is in an existing statute and has been construed by some of the courts, of course, we may know whether it means any party or all parties, but if there is no such decision construing that language certainly this House ought to be sure of its position and either say all or any.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I construe it to mean any interested party may bring in the other party.

Mr. STOBBS. Let me say to the gentleman that I am going to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. CELLER. The way the bill reads it is not necessary to have all the interested parties initiate the proceedings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the intent of it as I understand it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS] to offer an amendment.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I am going to offer an amendment, but before it is read let me say in reference to the testimony of Mr. McChesney that has been quoted, he says:

It seems to me the language might well be modified to read "on the request of any interested party."

That is the gentleman who introduced a bill before the committee.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, the gentleman from Missouri yielded the floor for amendment. Under the rule he must yield the floor if he yields it for an amendment. He has the right under the rule to yield time, but not for the purpose of offering an amendment. When the amendment is offered the floor goes to the one who offers the amendment, and so the gentleman from Missouri has no right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts offer his amendment to be read for information at this time?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that that was the procedure. The Clerk will read the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STOBBS: Page 1, line 10, after the word "of," insert the words "any of the," so that the line will read: "on request of any of the interested parties."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, of course it is impossible for anyone to discuss a bill of this kind in two minutes. Therefore I shall yield back the time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may have five minutes, regardless of the hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes, regardless of the hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, of course, I have not had the same opportunity to consider this bill that the members of the committee have had, and still there seems to be a very marked difference of opinion among the members of the committee. Any legislation that changes the regular procedure in our courts, I think, is of such importance that it ought not to be passed without very careful consideration. This legislation is more or less revolutionary in its character. We have never had such procedure as this before in the United States courts. We are authorizing a departure from the ordinary procedure. I do not know how this has worked in those States where they have laws of this kind. I know that in the State that I have the honor to represent in part there is no such procedure. I rise merely to express my misgivings in regard to it. The power to bring a person into court in a legal proceeding is a very great power. Whenever one person has a right to bring another into court over a controversy, and he exercises that right, he puts that other person then and there to an expense, and nowadays it is getting to be a very heavy expense. We are here by this bill conferring additional powers upon people to bring others into court. When you authorize one party to bring another into court, merely because there is a difference of opinion between them with reference to the construction of a contract, or a controversy between them in respect to property rights, that means that the other party has to employ counsel, and has to give his time, and in other ways incur heavy expenses, merely at the wish of the one who brings him into court, when there may be no litigation, but merely a difference of opinion. If we are going to approve this new procedure, I think we ought not to go so far as has been suggested. If it is going to be permitted at all, it ought to be permitted only upon the consent and agreement of all of the parties. I think you will be going a long way when you do that. I know that Members may not agree with me here, but I do not want this bill to pass without taking this opportunity in these few words of expressing my misgiving in respect to it, and to suggest that I think you are going too far when you authorize one party to bring in perhaps 50 others and compel them to employ counsel, when they may not want to go into court at all, when they might rather compromise the case than go into court and incur that expense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If we do not amend the bill so as to require the matter to be brought by the consent of all of the parties, would it not amount to piecemeal litigation? I am like the gentleman, and think there should be an agreement of all of the parties before this preliminary determination of any question can arise. Otherwise would it not mean we would increase the opportunity for litigation and have only piecemeal litigation?

Mr. DENISON. I think so. I think we ought not to authorize one party to bring others into court, merely because that one party wants to, or because there is a controversy or difference of opinion among them on questions of law or fact.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. But can not I sue anybody in the United States that I want to?

Mr. DENISON. You can, if the other party has violated your rights, if there is a cause of action; but now you are authorizing that to be done before there is a cause of action, and we ought not to do that except upon the agreement of all of the parties.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can go into a court of equity and prevent anybody from violating my rights in anticipation of the breach.

Mr. DENISON. That is a recognized procedure in equity jurisprudence, where irreparable injury is threatened, but the gentleman is lawyer enough to know that that is not pertinent to this question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is one step toward it.

Mr. GILBERT. Let us say that it is desirable for me to borrow a lot of money on a piece of property. There is no irreparable injury threatened because the man does not have to loan me the money, but he is willing to do it, if my title is all right. I ought to be permitted to go into court and have that determined.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILBERT. Here is an actual controversy that occurred in my State. A party heavily indebted with numerous creditors found a company that was willing to loan the money.

The company was in doubt as to the title. It had none of the ordinary remedies provided by law because it had not even gone into the transaction, but it was willing to go into the transaction, and it was highly desirable to a great number of creditors that an arrangement be made. The company merely came into court and filed its petition under a declaratory judgment to find out what her interest in that title was, and the court having determined that the title was good, the company then loaned her the money; and in that way a lot of people were saved and it protected everybody.

Now, if you are going to make it dependent on the agreement of everybody, you have practically destroyed the effect of your legislation, because, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], if they are all of them agreeable, they could probably agree without going into court.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. That is what they ought to do. Would it not be better than to have to employ counsel and go into court? Would it be right for one party to have the right to compel the others to go to that expense when no cause of action had yet arisen?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes. But courthouses are not made for people who can agree, but for people who can not agree.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Would it not be possible for one litigant to secure long delays in the settlement of controversies by requesting an interpretation of the contract?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am a new Member and have not got the acoustics of this building yet. I am asking whether or not, if this is permitted and one of the parties can request the remedy herein offered, it might be used as a vehicle for long delays of litigation; that is, putting off the evil day for settling the matters in controversy until certain matters should arise upon the petition?

Mr. DENISON. I confess I have not had the experience in this kind of procedure necessary to enable me to answer that question intelligently.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think it is a matter that should be considered. I am very favorable to the declaratory judgments if they are not used as a vehicle for delay.

Mr. DYER. I do not think it can be so used. It will be adjudicated by the court, and it will only be by appeal.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is declaratory of that question. I raise the question—not a moot question, but I raise that question. Perhaps there is nothing in it. Questions of that kind are often raised. While that is undetermined the merits of the case are not determined.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not a fact that it merely provides permission to go to court before judgment is made declaratory upon any interested party to state a cause of action and get an interpretation of law as it may be applied?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WELLER. May the gentleman have one-half minute more?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLER. And then without any stay or any power compelling either party to make an adjudication the rights of appeal are preserved, without intermediate delay or infringement on the rights of the parties.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] said a moment ago that under his interpretation the right arises under this bill before any cause of action existed at all, and the gentleman contends that this is only pertinent where a cause of action does exist.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was prepared by the American Bar Association, and it has been before the Committee on the Judiciary a number of times, and we have had hearings on it. The bill as it is presented to this House is in itself a new departure in practice in Federal courts, and I doubt the wisdom of going any further than the bill provides. If it is found to be advantageous in the settlement of controversies where matters have been brought into the courts of the United States, it can be enlarged so that any party can take advantage of it. But now it provides that all interested parties must be in accord and in agreement before advantage can be taken of this provision of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the gentleman contend that the bill as now written requires all interested parties to participate in the request?

Mr. DYER. Yes; it so says on line 10 of page 1.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It says "on request of interested parties."

Mr. DYER. It says "the said court upon petition shall have jurisdiction to declare rights and other legal relations on request of interested parties."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the gentleman think that would be sufficient to apply to all the parties?

Mr. RAMSEYER. All interested parties must agree. Then what is meant by the language on page 2, line 6, where it says:

> If the application be deemed sufficient, the court shall, on reasonable notice, require any adverse party, whose rights have been adjudicated by the declaration, to show cause why further relief should not be granted forthwith.

Mr. DYER. That is in case, Mr. Speaker, where the petition indicates whether a relief is necessary. But to get into court all interested parties must come in. This is for a subsequent proceeding.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then, in subsequent proceedings, you do not need the consent of all the parties?

Mr. DYER. No. I think the bill should be passed as it is presented, because I do not believe we should go wider afield than the bill provides.

Mr. NEWTON. Might not a substitute be offered for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS]?

Mr. STOBBS. I will offer an amendment.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman's motion would preclude the offering of any amendment whatever.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the motion if the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. DYER. I do.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I offer my amendment at this time before the moving of the previous question.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, I have sent to the Clerk's desk a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The bill has not been read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar, and the gentleman in charge on the floor yields for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Minnesota to offer a substitute.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Are not two hours of debate provided for under the rules?

The SPEAKER. Not in the case of a bill on the House Calendar. That is in the case of a bill on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri was entitled to one hour, and at any time during that hour he could move the previous question. He has yielded to two gentlemen for the purpose of offering amendments.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Has the hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The hour is about to expire. The gentleman has moved the previous question, but has withheld it temporarily.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended 15 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have 1 minute, and I move that the time be extended 16 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Missouri can not hold his previous question.

Mr. DYER. I have withdrawn that.

Mr. DOWELL. The previous question certainly can not be held by the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri, as the Chair understood, withheld his motion for the previous question and now asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 15 minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask that it be extended 16 minutes and that I be given 1 minute.

Mr. DYER. I will give the gentleman 1 minute out of the 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may know the question to be talked about, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the substitute offered thereto by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STOBBS: Page 1, line 10, after the word "of," insert the words "any of the."

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON: Page 1, line 10, insert in lieu of the Stobbs amendment the words "all of the."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have listened carefully to everything that has been said on this bill. I am interested in improving our judicial procedure, simplifying it, making it more easy to dispose of litigation and bringing about justice between parties that have controversies.

Undoubtedly the members of the committee of the American Bar Association who wrote this bill knew what they were driving at when they presented this bill to the Judiciary Committee. After listening carefully to every speech here—and most of them were made by members of the Judiciary Committee—I think I state a fact when I state that no two members of the Judiciary Committee agree on the meaning of the bill.

I think this bill should have further study and consideration by the Judiciary Committee, so that when it comes back the members of the Judiciary Committee can get up here, at least two of them together, and say that the bill means so and so. [Laughter and applause.] I can not support a measure when not even two members of the committee can agree on its meaning. Unless somebody else does so, when the proper time comes I intend to make a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. A motion to strike out the enacting clause would be in order, but I do not want to kill this proposal. However, I think it should have further study from the Committee on the Judiciary, and for that reason I shall move to recommit the bill at the proper time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, I agree substantially with the gentleman from Iowa. If there is anything that can be done to simplify the proceedings in our courts and make the rendering of justice more certain and speedy, I want to see it enacted. However, in our efforts to do so we ought to be very careful that we are doing that and not the reverse.

It seems to me to be perfectly clear, after glancing over the hearings, that the witnesses disagreed on the language of the bill. Mr. Henry W. Taft, a very eminent lawyer of New York, was of the opinion that the language made it coercive and that one party could bring all of the other parties into court. Now, the opinion of Mr. McChesney, another witness, as was brought out by the gentleman from Illinois, was just the contrary.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. The testimony of Mr. Taft was given during a former Congress, and I do not know whether he was testifying about this bill or a bill that may have been different.

Mr. NEWTON. That is not clear from the hearings.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is the same bill.

Mr. NEWTON. Then that clears that point up.

It seems to me we ought to at least make certain what is now uncertain. So the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS] has offered his amendment carrying out the idea that any party can bring in the interested parties, and the amendment I have offered strikes out "any of the parties" and inserts in lieu thereof "all of the parties."

It seems to me as long as this is new and rather novel—at least it is that way to me—because we have no provision of the kind in my State—it seems to be in starting this in the Federal courts we could very well restrict it so that all the parties must come in before they can invoke the power of the courts to declare a judgment.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, the gentleman's amendment will give the court the right to arbitrate the matter when they come before it prior to any litigation that may be brought.

Mr. NEWTON. That is approximately correct; and it seems to me that is as far as we should go.

Mr. DOWELL. I think the gentleman's amendment would be perfectly safe, but I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS] might be a very dangerous one.

Mr. NEWTON. Furthermore, in line 9 of the bill they have jurisdiction to declare "rights" and "other legal relations." This is a phrase that may mean a whole lot or it may mean very little. Some of us are rather fearful as to just what may be contained within that phrase, as it will be construed by the courts. It again illustrates the necessity of restricting rather than increasing the jurisdiction.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, so that the House might more clearly understand this bill, I restate it:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Judicial Code approved March 3, 1911, is hereby amended by adding after section 274C thereof a new section to be numbered 274D, as follows:

"SEC. 274D. (1) In cases of actual controversy in which, if suits were brought, the courts of the United States would have jurisdiction, the said courts upon petition shall have jurisdiction to declare rights and other legal relations on request of interested parties for such declarations whether or not further relief is or could be prayed, and such declarations shall have the force of final decree and be reviewable as such.

"(2) Further relief based on declaratory decree may be granted whenever necessary or proper. The application shall be by petition to a court having jurisdiction to grant the relief. If the application be deemed sufficient, the court shall, on reasonable notice, require any adverse party whose rights have been adjudicated by the declaration to show cause why further relief should not be granted forthwith.

"(3) When a declaration of right or the granting of further relief based thereon shall involve the determination of issues of fact triable by a jury, such issues may be submitted to a jury in the form of interrogatories, with proper instructions by the court, whether a general verdict be required or not.

"(4) The Supreme Court may adopt rules for the better enforcement and regulation of this provision."

A enters into a contract with B for the manufacture of a thousand tables at a certain price. Before A buys the material a controversy ensues as to whether or not the wood to be used is to be oak or cedar. A says it is oak. B says it is cedar. The contract itself is not clear. Under our present system, A would make up the tables of oak and take his chances upon a recovery for the price of same in a lawsuit after B had rejected them. The judgment of the court might be adverse to A in that the court construed the contract to mean cedar tables. A thus stands a great loss. He has a thousand unsold tables on his hands. If they are unusual or unique tables, he may never sell them.

How much better it would have been if A could come into court at the threshold of the dispute, before he bought all of the wood, and asked the court to declare a judgment that the contract meant either cedar or oak. That decision would be a declaratory judgment.

A and B, as owners, enter into an agreement to make a mineral lease with C as tenant. Subsequently it is claimed that A has only a life interest in the property and is not able to make or become a party to the lease. C wants the lease. If he takes it, he does so at his peril, because A might die during the term of the lease and his heirs at law might raise objection. If C could go into court and procure a declarative judgment he would be taking no chances. The court would first determine the respective rights of the parties and would declare a life tenant or owner in fee.

The above-stated facts are the exact facts in the Kariher case in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, September 23, 1925. In holding the Pennsylvania declaratory judgment statute constitutional (131 Atlantic Rep. 268) the court in the Kariher case said:

The distinctive characteristic of the declaratory judgment is that the declaration stands by itself; that is to say, no executory process follows as of course. Again, in order to obtain a declaration, it is not required that an actual wrong should have been done, such as would give rise to an action for damages, and no wrong need be immediately threatened, such as would be the proper basis for an injunction. In other words, a "cause of action," in the sense in which that term is ordinarily used, is not essential to the assumption of jurisdiction in this form of procedure. It is upon these characteristics of the declaratory judgment that the chief constitutional attacks have been based; its rights and obligations contemplated by the act represents the exercise of a nonjudicial duty, which the legislature can not place on the courts, and that, since such declarations do not necessarily include the right to execution, they are not judgments at all, but represent the mere giving of advice, rather than the adjudication of controversies, etc.

And then it goes on to say:

In considering these contentions, it may first be noted that there are many judgments under present forms which do not include the right to execution, except possibly for costs; and the present declaratory judgment practice involves an award as to costs (see sec. 10 of the act); moreover, under the act before us (sec. 8), execution, or "further relief," based on a declaratory judgment, may be had where appropriate and allowed by the court. Next, it may be noted that, since the numerous jurisdictions enjoying this practice all hold that a real controversy must exist, that moot cases will not be considered, and that declaratory judgments are res judicata of the points involved, such judgments can not properly be held merely advisory.

For many years the New York practice permitted executors or trustees under wills to go before surrogates to have wills or trusts interpreted. An executor doubtful of his rights or duties under a dubious clause or clauses of a will can ask the surrogate to "declare" the exact meaning of the clause or clauses in questions so that those rights or duties might be made clear. Otherwise he would take his chances and proceed in the dark and risk an attack upon his accounting. In other words, after the damage has been done an action would lie by the heirs or beneficiaries against him by taking exceptions to his acts upon the accounting. That is avoided by the declaratory judgment which the executor may invoke to avoid subsequent mistakes and difficulties.

Declaratory judgment enables persons in advance of subjecting themselves to a suit for damages to determine what they ought to do. The same protection afforded the trustee under a will should be accorded the manufacturer or business man.

Prof. Edwin Borchard, Yale University School of Law, has given concrete definition of declaratory judgment:

The declaratory judgment, it will be recalled, enables parties who are uncertain of their legal rights, and are pecuniarily or otherwise prejudiced by actual or potential adverse claims by others, to invoke the aid of the courts for the determination of their rights before an injury has been done.

It is as a measure of preventive justice that the declaratory judgment has its greatest efficacy. It is designed to give the parties opportunity to ascertain and determine their legal relations and to act accordingly, and thus avoid future trouble and litigation. Security thus takes the place of uncertainty. Of course, the court must be convinced that its judgment will serve a useful and practical purpose in quieting or making certain disputed jural relations either as to present or future obligations. The instant bill provides that there must be real issues. There must be actual controversy. The question must not be moot or hypothetical. The bill provides that the Supreme Court may adopt rules and regulations. Such rules would probably include the requirement of affidavits and proof that the parties are acting in good faith and that there is an actual dispute.

The practice of declaratory judgment has been a common one in Europe for many years. It is a heritage of the Roman law and prevails in most South American countries. The canny Scots have used it for more than four centuries. It has been universally used in England for 40 years and has been adopted in some 20 of our States. The State of New York recently revised its code of civil procedure and inaugurated many reforms. Among others it provided for the reform of declaratory judgment. It ought to be made part of the Federal system of justice.

Industrial and social relations in this country are becoming more intricate, complex, and diversified. Our judicial system must expand with these changes. These various relationships in industry, commerce, and social endeavor give rise to many wrongs. There should be a corresponding increase of judicial remedy. The remedy of declaratory judgment should be added to existing remedies. It will be universally acclaimed by the bar. American Bar Association as well as the National Conference of Commissions on Uniform State Laws have approved.

In our Federal system the procedure of declaratory judgment would be widely used. In countries where it obtains it is frequently made use of.

Thus claimants to a right of way, to subterranean support of surface lands, to the use of the foreshore, and to the unimpeded flow of water have brought declaratory actions to confirm their claims. On the other hand, the owners of land have sought declarations of privilege and right to the effect that defendants had no right of way, no right and no privilege to run their rain water on plaintiff's land, or to send their sewage through plaintiff's sewer, no easement of light, or no servitude over plaintiff's land.

Questions of title to personal property may likewise be tried by declaratory action, either in the affirmative or in the negative form. Thus, during the present war the British Admiralty has frequently requisitioned ships under charter, and the question as to the respective right of owner and charterer to the compensation due has been settled by declaratory action between the two claimants. Conflicting questions of title to certain funds as between private individuals, or between private individuals and the Government, or of title to specific chattels, may be determined by declaratory judgment. Questions of priority of different classes of creditors, e. g., mortgages and material men of a ship, and adverse questions of title to choses in action, have also been determined by this procedure. Declaratory actions have been brought to try the title to such authorized monopolies as patent, copyright or trade-mark privileges, and other franchises.

The bill was presented by the Judiciary Committee, but only in consideration that the bill be amended so that any one of the interested parties shall have the right to invoke the court's aid. As it now reads, all the interested parties must first agree to have the court declare the judgment. The provision should not be merely voluntary upon consent of all parties. It should be coercive. If one party wants a declaratory judgment, he shall have it. He summons the other party or parties as in the ordinary cause of action at law or in equity. As, particularly in equity cases, any interested party may be plaintiff and then the court has the right to bring all parties in, so in the declaratory judgment procedure anyone may sue and ask the court to bring all other interested parties in. Unless there is this coercion the declaratory judgment will lose most of its effectiveness and its use would be very limited.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield me five minutes?

Mr. DYER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, we have just prior to this bill passed a very important and very desirable bill adding an additional judge to the sixth judicial circuit, which includes the State of Michigan.

Within a few months we have passed legislation adding an additional judge to the eastern circuit of Michigan, including the city of Detroit. The Attorney General, in charge of law-enforcement activities of the country, is represented in that eastern district by the United States district attorney. It may be appreciated, therefore, that the business of the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Michigan is of very great importance, as it requires three Federal judges.

Notwithstanding that, when Delos S. Smith resigned as United States district attorney a year ago—as I recall, he resigned in December, his resignation to be effective February 1, 1927—from the time his resignation became effective until now no regular appointment of a United States district attorney has been made to take his place. For a long time the office was without any actual head, and the business of the United States Government centering in that office was necessarily neglected.

A few weeks ago, about the 1st of December, as I recall, the Federal judges in that district were so disturbed by the conditions that had come into being, by the failure to make an appointment, that the court acting under the law made a temporary appointment of a United States district attorney. They selected Mr. O. L. Smith, very well fitted for the position, and if he were acting under a regular appointment with some assurance as to the continuity of his authority it would be an excellent appointment. But acting under an appointment that necessarily must be temporary, made by the judges, without confirmation by the Senate as is necessary in a regular appointment, the situation is anomalous and undesirable.

So there is no one regularly appointed to administer that office. There is a great amount of business which is suffering by reason of the failure to make the appointment. Factional controversies should not be permitted to hamper expeditious and effective performance of the public business in that highly important office.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Can the gentleman tell us if he knows the reason of the failure to make an appointment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I can only give my opinion as to that. There is factional politics more or less prevalent in Michigan as in Virginia and certain other States. I sometimes congratulate myself that I am in Congress but not in politics. Certainly I am not a party to any of the factionalism that is in my judgment responsible for the breaking down of the administration of Federal justice in Michigan.

The State of Michigan has one United States Senator who is a Republican, and with him I have not affiliated politically in such degree as to inspire my making this statement on his account. But under the practice that is followed as to Federal appointments in Michigan his recommendation, if a good recommendation, ought to be followed by the Department of Justice, and if his recommendation is not good some statement by the department ought to be made and some definite position ought to be taken by the Department of Justice.

I have expressed to the Department of Justice twice within the last six weeks the views I am now expressing and perhaps more frankly than would be proper to do here.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in my judgment is quite to be relied upon to make a proper recommendation, and I believe he has done so. I believe that he will recommend only a man whom he feels is competent to administer the office and whose attitude toward enforcement of the law is such as to insure proper administration of the office. I have never discussed this matter with him. I speak only from general knowledge that comes from a variety of sources when I say that as I understand it he long ago made a recommendation which has neither been accepted nor refused. There is some talk to the effect that the gentleman who now occupies the office under the extraordinary appointment, which is at best of a temporary nature, might be prevailed upon to accept the regular appointment, but that the conditions are not right to bring that about. I do not know personally the man who has been recommended by the Senator. I have no candidate in whom I am interested, but as a citizen of the State of Michigan I am interested in the enforcement of the laws of the United States in the Federal courts of Michigan, and that can not be had while the office of the United States district attorney is without a responsible and permanent head. I hope that factionalism will not longer be permitted to interfere with such an appointment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It is the duty of the President of the United States to make this appointment, is it not?

Mr. CRAMTON. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and has a great many other things to do. I assume that he can not give his personal attention to all of these things. There is no occasion for the gentleman from Texas to try to make political capital out of this.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. But the gentleman himself said that politics had to do with this matter.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the gentleman from Texas can not affect party results in Michigan or can not in any way affect the next presidential election. There is an attempt to play factional politics within the party in Michigan at present, and I speak simply in the interest of good administration, and frankly call attention to the situation in the hope that publicity may help to relieve it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. We may as well lay the responsibility where it belongs, and that is at the door of the President of the United States.

Mr. CRAMTON. Which, of course, is not true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan suggested, I think, that one duty of the President of the United States which might interfere with his consideration of this appointment is that he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and I am wondering if the President is so interested in Nicaraguan affairs that he can not take time to appoint a district attorney in Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STENOGRAPHERS IN UNITED STATES COURTS

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9024, to authorize the appointment of stenographers in the courts of the United States and to fix their duties and compensations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill H. R. 9024. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9024, with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the district court of the United States in each district shall for the purpose of perpetuating the testimony and proceedings therein, appoint one or more competent stenographic reporters, as the business to be done may require, who shall be known as the official reporters of said courts and who shall hold office during the pleasure of the judges appointing them, or of the successors of said judges. Such reporters as may be appointed from time to time shall attend all sessions of or hearings before the said district courts, and shall upon the direction of the court or the request of either party in any civil or criminal action or proceeding take in shorthand the testimony and all proceedings had upon the trial or hearing, except the arguments of counsel, and shall, when directed by the court or a party to the proceedings, transcribe the same within such time as the court may designate and preserve the original stenographic notes for a period of not less than five years.

SEC. 2. Such reporters before entering upon the duties of the office shall be sworn to the faithful performance thereof.

SEC. 3. The transcript of the testimony and proceedings in any case when duly certified by such reporters shall be deemed prima facie a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings.

SEC. 4. The compensation of such stenographers for services and transcripts and their duties, and the rules and regulations relating thereto, shall be prescribed by rules to be adopted by the district court in each district. The compensation shall not exceed such as is now or may be hereafter provided by law in the State courts in the State in which such district court is held, if such law there be. Such compensation for services shall be paid to the stenographers herein authorized in the same manner as the salaries of the judicial office are paid. The fees to be paid to such stenographers by the parties to actions or proceedings in said courts shall be prescribed by rules to be adopted by said court in each district. They shall not exceed such as are now or may be hereafter required to be paid to the State stenographers in the respective States in which said district courts are held, if any such there be.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] if he desires to control some time?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, some requests for time on this side have been made.

Mr. DYER. Then, I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Texas will control one hour and I will control one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the time is to be divided between those in favor of the bill and those opposed it it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas control one hour and that I control one hour; and I give notice now that I intend to yield to those in favor of the bill as well as to those who are opposed to it, on this side of the aisle, and I take it that the gentleman from Texas will do the same on his side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate upon the bill be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, are we going to have two hours' debate on this little bill?

Mr. DYER. The request does not necessarily mean that. Debate can not go beyond two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule limits the debate to two hours, and the request of the gentleman is that debate on the bill shall be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Texas and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. I understand the request, and I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the purpose of providing stenographers for the courts of the United States, which they have not heretofore had and of which there is very great need. The bill is very simple and conforms to the practice in the various States in respect to salaries and fees.

I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I shall limit my remarks to just one feature of this bill. I do not believe there is any opposition to the appointment of stenographers in Federal courts. In some instances hardship has resulted from the lack of such stenographers. I know of a case not very long ago where a resident of New York was concerned in a case tried in Rhode Island; and the witnesses were brought there, and it was a rather important case to this man; and the case had to go over because there was no stenographer available.

What I am interested in is the method of appointment of these stenographers. I have a very strong letter here from the Civil Service Commission, and I shall put the whole of it in the RECORD. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment which I shall offer will simply provide that the appointments shall be in accordance with the civil-service rules and regulations.

Now, it has been argued that these stenographers should hold office during the pleasure of the judges. I want to point out the fact that my amendment does not disturb that in the slightest degree. The commission suggests this amendment in preference to the requirement that appointments be made from eligible registers established by the commission or through examination, for the reason that such requirements may be too restrictive, in that it may interpret it to mean that a position could not be filled by the transfer of a classified employee from another branch of the service or the reinstatement of a classified employee.

Mr. WELLER. Are not these stenographers who are now taking testimony in the courts appointed by the judges? Do they not take an examination under the civil service?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They will be appointed under the rules that the Civil Service Commission may establish in this case. They have to qualify before the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WELLER. Would it not take away from the judges the appointments already made of these men and put them into the hands of the Civil Service Commission? Some of them have been doing faithful work for many years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In that case they would have no trouble in qualifying under my amendment at all. When this matter was before the committee in the Sixty-first Congress the present Chief Justice was President of the United States; and Mr. Taft said:

> I am decidedly in favor of the merit system and the classified civil service for shorthand reporters in all courts. I do not know of any branch or any profession to which civil service is so admirably applicable as it is to the profession of court reporter, and you can use my name in support of such a proposition. You can not put my views too strongly on this subject.

Former President Wilson said:

> I entirely favor civil service appointment for stenographic reporters. I do not see how the principle can fail to be recognized as the best in this field as in others.

Hon. George W. Wickersham, ex-Attorney General of the United States:

I am strongly of the opinion that the official system of reporting should prevail in the Federal courts. I think a higher standard of work can be procured from men who have passed the civil service examinations and who have been appointed by the merit system, and not through personal or political influence. My own experience with the civil service system while in public office satisfies me that, properly administered, it constitutes a great improvement in the efficiency of all branches of the Government.

Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, ex-Attorney General of the United States:

I think all court stenographers should be selected by competitive examination and included in the classified service. Their duties are very important and responsible, and it is a matter of great consequence that they should be persons of great skill and experience, as well as of probity and good standing. I am always in favor of every judicious change in the law which reduces the number of positions bestowed through influence of favoritism and increases the number filled by reason of merit and fitness, ascertained by fair competition.

Hon. Frederick W. Lehmann, former Solicitor General of the United States and more recently one of the Mexican peace commissioners appointed by President Wilson:

I think reporting in the Federal courts should be done by official stenographers. I see no reason why they should not be appointed and be subject to removal by the courts in which they officiate. Appointments should be made for meritorious reasons and removals only for good cause.

Judge John Rollstab, of the United States district court at Trenton, N. J.:

I hope the day is not far off when we will have official stenographers in the Federal courts. I am strongly in favor of putting them under the civil service.

Judge Charles E. Wolverton, of the United States district court at Portland, Oreg.:

I am heartily in favor of placing stenographers in the Federal courts under the civil service. I think it would give better stenographic service, would be just to the stenographer, and give him something of permanency on the position.

Judge A. S. Sanborn, of the United States district court at Madison, Wis.:

I favor the plan to put Federal court stenographers under the civil service, chiefly for the reason that it will prevent the stenographers from losing their places on a change of the judge. While the position is a confidential one which many judges would prefer to fill on their own choice alone, I think the benefits of the civil service and of security of employment, not only to the employee but to the employer, far outweigh other considerations.

Hon. Alton B. Parker, formerly chief justice of the Court of Appeals of New York State:

There can be no doubt whatever of the wisdom and of the necessity of requiring all stenographers in the courts to pass civil-service tests. I am in favor of the proposed plan.

Hon. H. Snowden Marshall, former United States district attorney for the southern district of New York:

The present happy-go-lucky system in respect of reporting in the Federal courts can not last much longer, and if a law could be passed placing stenographers in these courts under the civil service, I think it would be a decided improvement. This highly important work should be put upon a more substantial and permanent basis. I think the civil service would be a solution of the problem.

Judge Edward T. Sanford, of the United States district court at Knoxville, Tenn.:

I think it would be an excellent plan to place stenographers in the Federal courts under the civil service. It would secure well-trained, efficient, and disinterested men to report the proceedings.

Judge Thomas I. Chatfield, of the United States district court at Brooklyn, N. Y.:

The appointment of official stenographers in the Federal courts upon a salary basis will, I think, prove a great relief to litigants who can ill afford the expense of taking testimony, where an appeal is not desired, and is seemingly one of the proper and necessary means of maintaining satisfactory procedure in court. I think the advantages will more than justify the increased expenditure.

Judge Julius M. Mayer, of the United States district court at New York, and formerly attorney general of the State of New York:

If appointments of official stenographers in the Federal courts are to be made, they should be made by the judges from eligible lists prepared by the United States Civil Service Commission.

Judge James E. Boyd, of the United States district court at Greensboro, N. C.:

I am of the firm conviction that Congress should enact legislation providing for official stenographers in the Federal courts in all cases, and that appointments to the positions thus created should be made after a thorough examination shows the appointees to possess the requisite qualifications. I hope the National Shorthand Reporters' Association will use its influence to bring about the legislation I suggest.

Hon. Francis Lynde Stetson, a distinguished lawyer of New York, who has had wide practice in the Federal courts:

I am heartily in favor of the extension of the civil service to cover the position of the stenographer in the Federal courts.

Judge John B. McPherson, of the United States court of appeals at Philadelphia:

I am in favor of having official stenographers in the Federal courts.

Hon. Samuel H. Ordway, a well-known lawyer of New York and president of the National Civil Service Reform League:

The establishment of the official system of reporting in the Federal courts would be a desirable and useful reform. The convenience of judges, lawyers, and litigants and the administration of justice generally would be promoted by the adoption of a system which will result in securing the most efficient and capable stenographers, unaffected by personal or political considerations.

It is generally admitted that the supreme court in the State of New York has most efficient stenographers, all of whom were appointed as the result of a very severe competitive examination. This scheme has worked well and is approved by everyone. It ought to be extended to the Federal courts.

I think it may fairly be asserted that the stenographic work done in our State courts is of a higher quality than in the Federal courts. Many persons feel that the abolition of the fee system in public offices results in a higher type of public service, and while such a change would undoubtedly add to the expense of maintaining and administering the Federal courts, I think it is conceded generally that the additional expense would be more than justified by the results.

Hon. Kenesaw M. Landis, the distinguished judge of the United States district court at Chicago:

Although I have not given much thought to the subject, I can see no objection to the plan of placing stenographers in the Federal courts under the civil service.

Judge James L. Martin, of the United States district court at Brattleboro, Vt.:

Federal court reporters should by all means be put under the civil service.

Judge George W. Ray, of the United States district court at Norwich, N. Y.:

If the Congress makes a law providing for official stenographers in the Federal courts, they should be placed under the civil service.

Judge John C. Rose, of the United States district court at Baltimore, Md.:

I think it would be the part of wisdom to put Federal court stenographers under the civil service. The less judges have to do with matters of patronage the better for all concerned.

Judge Frank S. Dietrich, of the United States district court at Boise, Idaho:

I think the plan to place stenographers in the Federal courts under the civil service would be entirely practicable and desirable in cases where the stenographer acts exclusively as a court official.

Judge Benjamin F. Keller, of the United States district court at Charleston, W. Va.:

I am most heartily and emphatically in favor of the civil service as applied to stenographers in the Federal courts. I am a firm believer in the practical utility of the civil service and should be most happy to have the aid of the United States Civil Service Commission in the selection of a stenographer for my court.

Of course, I am most immediately concerned in the still unsettled question as to whether we shall have an official stenographer at all (a consummation devoutly to be wished), but assuming that the bill becomes a law, I should hail as an added blessing the certification of fitness by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WELLER. Does President Wilson there refer to stenographers or to court reporters?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To stenographic reporters.

Mr. WELLER. They might be court reporters or stenographers in an office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These extracts that I have received from the Civil Service Commission refer to stenographers.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman think the Civil Service Commission will be as successful in selecting good court reporters as they were in furnishing candidates for prohibition enforcement officers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman any doubt about that?

Mr. BURTNESS. I think the courts and district judges are familiar with the ability of stenographers and reporters in their territory, and they can exercise bettter judgment than can the commission by holding some sort of technical examination which includes a lot of foolish questions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me answer the gentleman's question. It does not at all follow that the Civil Service Commission will require an examination. They may require merely the submission of certain evidence respecting past experience and ability, and then the choosing of stenographers for the courts is entirely with the judges. The commission will submit three names. If the judges do not like the three names, they will submit three more; and if the judges do not like those three, additional names will be submitted; and the selection is left entirely with the judges, and it gives everyone an equal chance.

Now, in reply to the gentleman's second statement, I went down to the Civil Service Commission and I looked at these papers which were used in the civil-service examination for prohibition officers, and if anyone is so dull that he could not answer those simple questions, I do not believe he has any kick coming if he was not declared qualified. I will say to the gentleman that 50 per cent of the papers had the answers there. They have five answers, one correct and four incorrect, and all the candidate had to do was to write down the number of the correct answer; and I can not imagine any intelligence test that would be better adapted to testing the intelligence of a human being than those questions which the gentleman referred to.

I went there believing that, perhaps, it was a very difficult and tricky examination, but it was not. It was not tricky; it was not difficult; it was simply the test of a mediocre, ordinary intelligence of a grammar-school boy and nothing else.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman referred to the fact that an eligible register was to be furnished. Can the gentleman tell us whether, if his amendment should be adopted, that eligible register would consist of the names of those from the State or general community in which the vacancy exists, or would it be a register giving eligibles that might have qualified anywhere in the country?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, if you did that I can readily understand, upon an intelligence test, where New York would have an edge. I can very well understand that, but I do not think that will be the case.

Mr. BURTNESS. If that should be true in New York with respect to court reporters, would it be true in New York with respect to prohibition agents?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I give way to North Dakota on that, but I believe the Civil Service Commission would classify these men according to judicial districts.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman's amendment contain that sort of a suggestion?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; my amendment simply provides that these appointments shall be made in accordance with civil-service regulations. I want to point out, in anticipation of an objection that may be raised, that my amendment does not require that a stenographer not satisfactory to a judge should be put on trial. I do not interfere with the privilege of removal by the judges.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman a question with reference to that very point. When a man acquires a civil-service status and is appointed to a position under the civil service, there would have to be certain procedure to get clear of him. Now, a stenographer may be absolutely competent so far as taking testimony is concerned, but temperamentally he may be such that he might become objectionable both to the bar and the judge, not because of any infirmity you can lay your hand on, but because of his general demeanor. Does not the gentleman think the judge ought to have the right to remove him at any time?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He has. Let me read what the Civil Service Commission says about that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know that before I vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can answer that. This is a communication from the Civil Service Commission:

> The commission, however, desires to call your attention to requirements of the removal rule. An appointing officer is permitted to remove any classified employee for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service, but reasons in writing must be given the employee, and he is given sufficient time to make a reply in writing. No trial or hearing is necessary unless the removing officer desires it. Contrary to general opinion, the commission has no authority to investigate a case of removal unless it is alleged with offer of proof that the removal is made for political or religious reasons or the employee was not furnished in writing the reasons for his removal.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then, if a man were contentious he could file a claim with the Civil Service Commission to the effect that he had been improperly removed and ask for a hearing?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. The communication goes on to answer that.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is what they say; but I want to know the law of the case, and what the gentleman has already read suggests to me that there could be a trial.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are bound by what they say.

> It will be seen that there is no rule which requires the retention of an inefficient employee. This is called to your attention not with a view to having the cause relating to removal inserted unless you believe such action advisable, but for your information.

I do not believe there is any doubt about that. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that no one has been a stauncher supporter of proper appointments under civil-service rules than has the gentleman, because he has had some pretty sad experiences in his State.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have tried to regulate some of them; but as to this proposition, the other question I want to ask the gentleman is this: There is a provision in the bill to the effect that the salaries shall not exceed the salaries paid to State stenographers. Does not the gentleman think it would be better for us to fix the salaries so that the salaries may be uniform all over the United States? What is the sense of having a polyglot system like that, where one State may pay $2,000, another $3,000, and another $2,500? If we fix the salaries in the bill then the men who are appointed will get the same salaries, whether they are from South Carolina, New York, or Massachusetts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the chairman of the committee will answer that fully; but the answer is this: You can not pay a court stenographer who sits every day of the year from morning until night, because the court is in session every day, the same salary that you would pay a man in a jurisdiction where the court sits at stated times. That is the difference. If the gentleman wants to make a uniform scale of salaries for this work, of course he can do so, but there is no comparison in the various jurisdictions. You take the southern and eastern districts of New York. There we have five or six parts going every day, and the stenographers are working every day, while in another part the court holds terms at stated times, and during the rest of the time the stenographer is not engaged at all.

Mr. McSWAIN. In order that we may understand exactly what we are providing for, is it the gentleman's understanding of the provision that is written at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3 that if this should become a law the stenographers would receive the flat salary or per diem that is provided by the various States, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and that, in addition thereto, these stenographers might charge the parties to the action fees for the services rendered in the particular cases? Is that the contemplation of the committee as expressed by the language employed here?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the practice in courts when the parties to litigation want the minutes to pay so much a folio for them. Even in our State courts, where the stenographers are paid very handsomely, when we order the minutes written up we have to pay for them.

Mr. McSWAIN. But this does not say fees for transcribing testimony. This says "fees," and there would be no limitation upon the fees. The judge could very easily say, "Now, gentlemen, if you wish this stenographer to operate in this case you must put up $25 as a cash deposit on each side."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think that is intended at all. The following letter came to me from the United States Civil Service Commission:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1928.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LAGUARDIA: Your interest in the proposed legislation relating to the employment of stenographers in the courts of the United States is very much appreciated by the commission. It is pleased to give you additional information that may be of use to you and assures you that further information will be gladly furnished upon request.

In the event it is felt there would be objection to requiring removals made in accordance with the civil-service rules and regulations, the bill may be amended to require that appointments be made in accordance with the civil-service rules and regulations and no reference made to the manner of making removals.

The commission has been furnished with a copy of H. R. 9024, introduced by Mr. GRAHAM, which is similar to H. R. 5559, and the commission makes the suggestion that H. R. 9024 be amended to read as follows: Add after the word "appoint," line 5, the first page, "in accordance with the civil-service rules and regulations." The commission suggests this wording in preference to the requirement that appointment be made from eligible registers established by the commission or through examination for the reason that such requirement may be too restrictive in that it may be interpreted that the position could not be filled by the transfer of a classified employee from another branch of the service or through reinstatement of a classified employee. This does not require removals in accordance with the civil-service rules and regulations. This is covered by line 8 of the first page, which states that the official reporters shall hold office during the pleasure of the judges appointing them or the successors of the said judges.

The commission, however, desires to call your attention to requirements of the removal rule. An appointing officer is permitted to remove any classified employee for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service, but reasons in writing must be given the employee and he is given sufficient time to make a reply in writing. No trial or hearing is necessary unless the removing officer desires it. Contrary to general opinion, the commission has no authority to investigate a case of removal unless it is alleged with offer of proof that the removal is made for political or religious reasons or the employee was not furnished in writing the reasons for his removal. It will be seen that there is no rule which requires the retention of an inefficient employee. This is called to your attention not with a view to having the cause relating to removal inserted unless you believe such action advisable but for your information. It is advisable, however, to separate only for a good reason as it is not always possible for one reporter to read the notes of another reporter though the same system of shorthand reporting is followed. The reference to old notes sometimes causes trouble if the reporter at that time has left the vicinity.

The appointment of court reporters through civil-service examinations is neither new nor experimental. Reporters for testimony of proceedings in the State of New York have been successfully and satisfactorily selected as the result of competitive examination since 1896. The commission has been informed that in every instance a fully competent court reporter has been obtained as a result of the examination established by the State civil service commission. Qualified eligibles have also been secured by this commission in connection with similar work of the Federal Government. Employees appointed under civil-service rules and regulations have been assigned to such work as hearings of claim boards, investigations, etc.

In many instances a judge is not in a position to determine which stenographer of a number of applicants would be the best qualified. In some instances selections are made of a person readily available or for political or personal reasons. The importance of this work should make the selection of the best qualified eligible necessary. The commission has examined stenographers for a period of years and it is believed you will find that the results have been satisfactory. The employing of reporters who are not qualified to satisfactorily perform the duties of the position may result in considerable expense and inconvenience. Reference is made to such a condition in a statement made by Mr. Fred Ireland, an official reporter of debates, House of Representatives, on May 6, 1912, before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. It appears that a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee went to a Southern State in connection with an investigation. The man who was assigned to the duty of taking the testimony was not a qualified reporter, and as a result there was so much of the testimony omitted the committee agreed that it was impossible to proceed on the record. There was considerable delay in order that the testimony of the respondent could again be secured. This, of course, resulted in the holding up of important legislation. This is an unusual case, but there should be no objection to reducing the possibility of a similar condition to a minimum.

The examination to be held for this position would be on the identical work the reporter is to perform—rapid, accurate writing of court matter, accurate and rapid transcription of the notes, and possibly oral reading of portions of the stenographic notes, the same as to a court or jury.

Perhaps the strongest reasons for favoring the requirement that appointments of court stenographers be made in accordance with civil-service rules and regulations will be found in the inclosed memorandum. The statements made by the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, by former President Wilson, former ex-Attorney Generals, and a number of judges and lawyers are convincing. It is only fair to the presiding judge, to the jury, and to all parties concerned to have only the best court stenographers available to make an accurate report of a case.

After considering the matter from the various angles, the commission feels that better qualified court stenographers can not be secured through any other system or method, and is willing to assume the responsibility of securing qualified court stenographers.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. DOYLE, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. This bill will be read under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, the Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky., is one of the old, honored, conservative papers of the United States. It has very able editorial writers now and has in the past had such geniuses of journalism as Watterson and Prentiss.

I want to read as a part of my remarks an editorial of the Courier-Journal of yesterday, entitled "Mr. Coolidge at Habana":

MR. COOLIDGE AT HABANA

President Coolidge's address at the opening of the Pan American Conference in Habana yesterday, as an expression of generalities, was lofty, catholic, and patriotic. It is unfortunate that much of it, in concrete application, will strike the world as ill-timed and maladroit.

Here are some examples:

"The people" of the Western Hemisphere, he is happy to say, "have taken charge of their own affairs."

Let everyone forget, for this special occasion, that "the people" does not include the people of Nicaragua.

"The spirit of liberty is universal."

But it must be shot out and bombed out in Nicaragua.

"The sovereignty of small nations is respected."

Though not necessarily if the nation is as small as Nicaragua.

"It is better for the people to make their own mistakes than to have someone else make their mistakes for them."

Except, of course, when the United States does not choose to let the people of Nicaragua make mistakes.

"We are thoroughly committed to the principle that they are better fitted to govern themselves than anyone else is to govern them."

That is to say, anyone else outside the State Department at Washington.

"We must join together in assuring conditions under which our republics will have the freedom and the responsibility of working out their own destiny in their own way."

Provided, as in the case of Nicaragua, that their destiny is the destiny dictated by us and their own way is our way.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a very good bill, I think, has been suggested in H. R. 9024, but the purpose of the amendment of my colleague from New York would seem to destroy, to my mind, the intention of the bill and all good that the bill could really do in the administration of justice in the city of New York and in other large metropolitan centers where court business is extremely large. I do not pretend to speak for the districts where they only hold a court session once or twice a year and then the Federal judge goes to some other part of the district.

I have in mind my personal experience in trying cases in the Federal courts, for instance, in the State of New Jersey at Trenton, where counsel on each side pays a certain amount of money as a per diem. In Trenton we paid $7.50 apiece for the taking of the stenographer's minutes. In the court at the city of Buffalo I paid $10 and counsel on the other side paid $10 to the stenographer for the purpose of having the minutes taken each day, and the trial of the case lasted some 12 or 14 days. No salaries are paid.

The amendment of my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] goes further than this and attempts to write into this bill something which, I believe, is not only not germane to the bill but absolutely destructive of the bill, and that is to put the appointment of all these stenographers and the amount of their compensation and their hiring and their "firing" within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. My amendment does not go as far as that. It applies only to the qualifying of them, and nothing else.

Mr. WELLER. They would qualify them, and then they can not be removed except upon charges, which is practically similar to the provisions with respect to any appointive officer in the State of New York. In other words, the stenographer could not be discharged except for good cause shown, and he must receive a copy of the charges and have an opportunity to be heard and to be represented by counsel.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, there is nothing like that in the Federal civil service.

Mr. WELLER. That is the way it will work out under the proposed amendment. You watch it and see if that is not the way it will work out. I have been through it. I have tried to have Federal employees reinstated and I know what a job it is, and unless you do have counsel and unless you go down there and put up a fight, which is equivalent to a fight in court, you can not get your man put back, and I say this with all due deference to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will permit, there is no provision in the law which entitles a clerk to reinstatement if his dismissal is not on account of either religion or politics.

Mr. WELLER. I do not know whether the gentleman was present when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] read his proposed amendment, which provides that the appointment and the classification of the stenographer and the question of whether or not the stenographer has proper attainments and ability, should all be determined after investigation and examination by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will yield further——

Mr. WELLER. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am not in sympathy with the amendment, and I am not defending the amendment. I am merely trying to dispel any belief that may exist among the membership of the House that there is any real, adequate protection in the civil service law for reinstatement of an employee who is wrongfully dismissed, provided the dismissal was not based on religion or politics. He can be dismissed for any reason, and there is no way of getting him back, and there is no hearing allowed, either.

Mr. WELLER. Yes. I am very glad to know that, and I do not think the gentleman and I are differing very seriously about the situation, except I am talking the practical end of it and the gentleman is talking the statute.

What I have in mind is that if you are going to take away from the judge of the court the appointment of these stenographers, which power, from almost time immemorial, the judge has had, and take the hiring and, so to speak, the "firing" of the stenographers away from the judge of the court, then you are making a radical change. The judges themselves should have the absolute power to appoint competent men.

We have now throughout the United States in the various courts very competent men who are taking stenographic records, and have been doing so for years. They also often assist a judge when he is writing his opinion and the relation is highly confidential, so that the judge should always be permitted to exercise his choice.

If this proposed amendment goes into effect the result would be that these men would have to be relegated to the Civil Service Commission, or something tantamount to it. Why should those who have been doing satisfactory work for judges, taking records for years, be compelled to go to any kind of a Civil Service Commission?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WELLER. Why should we, under the circumstances, change the fundamental organization of our courts by placing the appointive power practically in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, because unless the Civil Service Commission O. K's the judge's stenographer who is sometimes the judge's secretary, that man can not be appointed no matter how well qualified he is.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman opposed to civil service?

Mr. WELLER. No; I am not.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman a few moments ago related what a lot of red tape would be required to have employees under civil service reinstated—you would have to have a hundred times as much under political pressure to get a man reinstated.

Mr. WELLER. That may be true, but with reference to the reinstatement of a stenographer against whom charges have been preferred, for all practical purposes he could not be reinstated. Supposing a disappointed litigant made charges that the stenographic notes had not been taken properly, that they had not been fairly taken, and that matter was to go before a public hearing. It would practically destroy the usefulness of that stenographer forever, even though he was cleared of the charges made against him. It would practically destroy his usefulness, and in case the judge who appointed him dies or resigned, he would not be reappointed by any other judge because the record of the proceeding would be in the Civil Service Commission and no judge would want a stenographer who had the slightest trace of suspicion or accusation against him. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York will be voted down. I indorsed the bill, and I think there should be a salary for the districts where there would be an amount of work done comportable with the district itself. The bill was drawn to that effect. Where the work in the district is particularly heavy there is an added compensation given to him in that he may charge for his services in furnishing minutes to counsel on either side.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not want to take any unnecessary time in the discussion of this except to point out two salient features that make it absolutely advisable legislation. Anybody who has had any experience in the Federal courts knows that it is necessary under present conditions to pay the stenographer's fees out of your own pocket. If you are unfortunate enough to represent a litigant who has no money and your litigation takes several days you are placed in the unenviable position of being obliged to pay a large expense out of your own pocket.

In almost every State the court stenographers are paid by the State itself. Not only is the present Federal practice unfair but it is discriminatory against the poor litigant.

Now, the most potent feature of this is that in making up the charge the judge is dependent on the manuscript and testimony written out by the stenographer, with whom he had nothing to do as far as selection is concerned. In other words, the judge in making up the data for his charge must go to the counsel in the case and ask permission to use their stenographer to furnish the transcript. So this bill, if it does not accomplish anything else, accomplishes this fact, that it gives the court the right to appoint its own stenographer, to be paid by the Government of the United States. Then if counsel want to use that evidence they go to that stenographer and pay out of their own pockets for such transcript of the evidence as they may desire; but the court selects its own stenographer and has the privilege of having the testimony taken by some one that it can select itself, and that makes it very valuable legislation.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I agree thoroughly with what the gentleman says as to the need for, and the general purposes of, the legislation, but I confess that I do not think the bill is very clear as to what the reporters to be appointed are obliged to do, or whether litigants will still be compelled to pay fees for merely taking the testimony if the court thinks the litigants should pay such fees. If I understand the gentleman correctly, the object of the bill is that an official reporter be appointed who is to take down all the testimony and proceedings at the trial.

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. And then if either litigant desires to obtain a transcript of the testimony, the litigant shall pay for it?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. And pay such fees therefor as the courts prescribe?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the gentleman will note that the bill in section 1 provides that such reporters as may be appointed shall attend all sessions of or hearings before the said district courts, and shall, upon the direction of the court or the request of either party in any civil or criminal action or proceeding, take in shorthand the testimony and all proceedings had upon the trial or hearing, and so forth. First, does not that contemplate that even with the appointment of reporters the testimony would not always be taken down and would not be taken down unless requested either by the court or by one of the parties to the action?

Mr. STOBBS. That is perfectly true, but that is the practice in practically all of the courts at the present time. The court may turn to the reporter and say to him that he need not take down this case, or he may say to counsel, "Do you want this case taken down?" In a lot of criminal cases they do not even bother to take the testimony, and the stenographer sits there and does not take it down until the court directs him to do so. That is simply a saving of time and expense. The counsel do not expect to go up to the Supreme Court, and it may involve a fine of only $50. They do not bother to take the evidence, but the court may say to the counsel, "Do you want the testimony taken down?" and if the counsel says "Yes," the court will then direct the reporter to take the testimony.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the bill also goes on to say:

and shall, when directed by the court, or a party to the proceedings, transcribe the same within such time as the court may designate and preserve the original stenographic notes for a period of not less than five years.

Mr. STOBBS. That means simply this: That after the testimony has been taken the court may say to that stenographer, "I want you to write out such and such pages of testimony," and the stenographer will do it, and counsel may come along also and say, "I want such and such pages of testimony," so that either by direction of the court or by the request of counsel it will be transcribed, but counsel will pay for what he orders.

Mr. BURTNESS. But the bill does not say that.

Mr. STOBBS. I think if the gentleman will read it carefully he will see that that is exactly what it does say.

Mr. BURTNESS. I call attention to page 3 to the following language:

The fees to be paid to such stenographers by the parties to actions or proceedings in said courts shall be prescribed by rules to be adopted by said court in each district.

Is there an attempt in this bill to distinguish between "fees" and "compensation" as such?

Mr. STOBBS. Oh, no; but in certain parts of the country stenographers write out testimony at, say, 10 cents a folio, while in other places they get 25 cents for a folio of 100 words. It is up to the court to state whether they will get 10 cents or 25 cents.

Mr. BURTNESS. Would not this bill as it is written authorize the court to say to a litigant, "If you want the stenographer to take down the testimony you will have to pay such-and-such fees for the purpose."

Mr. STOBBS. Oh, no. This bill does not say that at all.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think that is what the bill says, but I do not think it is what the committee intends to say. It seems to me it ought to be easy to provide in the bill that the salary or compensation of the reporter shall be along the line suggested here—that is, the compensation provided in State courts—for the work to be done by the stenographer as an official, and I take it that the gentleman feels, as I do, that the principal part of this work would be to take down the testimony and proceedings in the trial of the case, and then if a litigant on either side orders a transcript, that then those fees shall be determined by the court and paid for by the litigant.

Mr. STOBBS. I call the gentleman's attention to page 2, commencing at line 5—and shall, when directed by the court or the party to the proceedings, transcribe the same.

That makes it obligatory on the stenographer to do what the court tells him to do.

Mr. BURTNESS. And also it makes it obligatory on the stenographer to do what some litigant tells him to do; and if the bill means that the litigant may demand it at any time without paying for it, that would be unfair, because the litigant might demand a transcript of all of the testimony, and the trial may have lasted for several days.

Mr. STOBBS. The bill says further:

The compensation of said stenographers for services and transcripts and their duties, and the rules and regulations relating thereto, shall be prescribed by rules to be adopted by the district court in each district.

In other words, the court makes the rules and regulations under which any individual litigant may have the transcript. That controls the whole situation.

Mr. BURTNESS. There seems to be some distinction between "compensation" and "fees." Possibly that tends to clarify the intent.

Mr. STOBBS. The two things are quite distinct. "Compensation" is what the Government pays as a salary, and "fees" are what the individual pays for writing out the testimony.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. STOBBS. Surely.

Mr. HAMMER. As I understand, the gentleman is discussing the reporting of civil cases in United States courts in the large cities. Take the State of Maryland outside of Baltimore, and the State of Tennessee except the cities of Nashville, Knoxville, and Memphis, and the State of North Carolina, except the cities of Raleigh, Asheville, Winston-Salem, Charlotte, and Wilmington, and the State of Georgia, with the exception of Savannah and Atlanta, and all the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Oklahoma—in all those States there is as much as a whole year in which in some of the courts no civil cases are tried whatever. For instance, there are half a dozen places where Federal courts are held and only one case, either civil or criminal, requiring a stenographer.

Mr. STOBBS. You are talking about Federal courts?

Mr. HAMMER. Yes; I am talking about Federal courts. In the State of North Carolina, where I live, there are three districts. With the exception of two or three in each one of the courts there are no civil cases tried except at special terms or adjourned terms, at which, of course, a stenographer is necessary.

I want to ask this question: Have not the courts the power now to employ stenographers? In criminal cases I know they have ample means under the provisions of the law to secure stenographic reports whenever necessary.

Mr. STOBBS. My information is that there is no provision at the present time authorizing the courts to employ official stenographers.

Mr. HAMMER. There are provisions in which that is done in criminal cases.

Mr. STOBBS. By looking at the bill the gentleman will notice that "the district court in each district shall, for the purpose of perpetuating the testimony and proceedings therein, appoint one or more competent stenographic reporters, as the business to be done may require." Of course, if there is no business to be done requiring the appointment of stenographers, the court will not appoint.

Mr. HAMMER. Does not the gentleman think there would be a tendency to make appointments?

Mr. STOBBS. Oh, no. You must rely on the integrity of the judges.

Mr. HAMMER. I do not mean to reflect upon them, but the disposition in human nature is to create offices when the power is given. The gentleman knows that, or at least should know the tendency of human impulses to prevail on the bench as well as elsewhere.

Mr. STOBBS. I think the judges of the United States courts should be trusted to that extent.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have looked in vain as to any estimate of how many stenographers will be appointed and how much they will cost the Government. There seems to be no information whatever as to the cost of this measure to the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CAREW. The gentleman should know that the Committee on the Judiciary never bothers itself with matters of expense to the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That may be the reason why the report does not give us any information on that point.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this is good legislation unless we ruin it with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I think it would be a very serious mistake to put these stenographers under the civil service.

However, I want to speak chiefly concerning another feature of the bill, which you will find on page 2, where it is provided that—

Such reporters as may be appointed shall attend all sessions of the district courts and shall, upon the direction of the court or the request of either party in any civil or criminal action or proceeding, take in shorthand the testimony and all proceedings had upon the trial or hearing, except the arguments of counsel.

I think there ought to be some provision whereby the arguments of counsel in certain cases and under certain circumstances shall, at the direction of the presiding judge, be taken down by the stenographer. We have all seen cases arise in the courts where it was well to take down the arguments of counsel. Such an occasion might arise, I will say, where questions of contempt are involved, and also such an occasion might arise where a lawyer, properly looking after the interests of his client, makes remarks that are excluded by the court as improper and he wishes the ruling to become a part of the record. In that event the part of the argument in question should also become a part of the record. It might arise in the case of motions for mistrial. It might arise in many ways where it is in the interest of fair play and justice that the arguments of counsel should be reported.

I propose, on page 2, line 5, after the word "hearing," to strike out the word "except" and substitute the words "including the arguments of counsel when the presiding judge may direct."

Mr. NEWTON. I get the gentleman's idea. It is merely to have the presence of a stenographer, so that in the event something occurs the judge may, in his discretion, order the words to be taken then, and then the work will be done.

Mr. EDWARDS. It will not be taken down unless, in the opinion of the presiding judge, it is proper and necessary. The bill provides that the stenographer shall be present. I think the gentleman will agree with me that cases may arise when in the interests of justice it is proper and necessary to have the arguments of counsel taken down.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is unquestionably correct.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 9024) to authorize the appointment of stenographers in the courts of the United States and to fix their duties and compensation, had come to no resolution thereon.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ALLEGED MEXICAN PROPAGANDA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Washington News this morning has the following about me:

> The Democratic Senators have TOM HEFLIN on their hands and don't know what to do with him. They are holding a conference this morning to try to decide.

Mr. President, on last Tuesday the minority leader, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, came over to my seat and asked me if I was willing to have the Senate adjourn over until Thursday, and make my speech on Thursday instead of Wednesday, that he wanted to have a conference of the Democrats to consider the merchant marine measure. I told him that I preferred to go on with my speech on Wednesday and have the conference Thursday—to-day. I did not know that the conference which met this morning was to consider any part of the controversy raised on yesterday between the Senator from Arkansas and myself. Some have stated that the Senator said he would bring it up at the conference to-day. I did not hear him say that. I thought it was the usual conference, and that we would consider the merchant marine matter.

I had suggested on yesterday that in view of the Senator's very strange conduct in assailing me and my speech, he being for the present the minority leader, he ought to be relieved of that service. I made that suggestion. I did not consult a single Senator on this side about removing him as our leader. I would not expect them to remove him for what he said yesterday. I was merely expressing my own opinion in the matter. I thought his conduct was exceedingly strange, unwarranted, inexcusable, and indefensible. But I would not expect the Senators to meet in a conference and remove him because I felt that way about a matter arising between us.

When he had taken the position that he did take, so unlooked for by Democrats generally on this side—I do not know how many knew that he was going to make that speech; I do not think very many. I think I could name some of them, and I may do it before this debate is over, because this is one forum, thank God, that the people still have where the truth can be uttered, where the forces of concentrated wealth and the power of the Roman hierarchy can not suppress free speech. This is one place we can come to, those who are sent here, and represent their people and speak for the good of their country without consulting any particular Senator as to what course we will pursue.

Everybody who has commented to me on this thing on the outside has said that Senator ROBINSON's attack upon me was the most uncalled-for and outrageous thing they ever heard of; and I agree with them. But I am able to take care of the Senator from Arkansas without asking my party to remove him as leader. I can understand how they would not want to vote to remove him as leader for what he did yesterday. I would not expect them to do that.

This morning I was having a good rest after performing my duty yesterday. I had slept nine hours. A little before 10 o'clock my secretary phoned me that they were having a conference and that I had notice to appear. He did not tell me what was in it. I always get a notice to attend a conference, and I thought it was the usual conference. I did not go, and the Senator from Arkansas in my absence took up the matter as to removing himself as leader and taking him off the committee to investigate the Hearst scandal. I did not know the matter was being considered; knew nothing about it until the conference had adjourned.

Some rather interesting talks were made in the conference. They finally passed a resolution, which I would have expected them to pass, expressing confidence in his leadership. I indorse his leadership myself, in the main. I differ from him on some things. I could not expect them to remove him and I had not asked them to do it. It was only a kind of whitewash arrangement regarding his leadership; they expressed confidence in him and were willing for him to remain on the committee. I would expect them to take that course and I have no quarrel with them for taking that course.

My enemies in the press gallery, who do not represent the best interests of the people—and I do not mean all of them; there are some as fine men up there as you find anywhere, honest, courageous, fine Americans, and I am not talking about them. There are two classes of them; one class is good and the other is exceedingly bad. [Laughter.] That exceedingly bad group of newspaper reporters are going to give out the notice to-day that Senator HEFLIN was rebuked by the Democratic Senators. It is not true. The best Democrats in this body, in my absence—I was not even there when the matter was considered—took the position that this resolution was in no way to reflect on Senator HEFLIN, was in no way to be considered as a rebuke of him for his speech of yesterday or for his position. That was distinctly understood. Yet I am looking now to see from some of the press reports that Senator HEFLIN was rebuked by the Democratic side. Most all the Senators voted for the resolution. As I said in the outset, I would have expected them to do it in the matter of removing the Senator from Arkansas from leadership, or taking him off the committee, because he and I had a controversy.

I was angered at the Senator from Arkansas on yesterday. It would not be expected that I would be otherwise. Strange, indeed, was his position, acting on this committee to investigate a terrible scandal with which my name was connected, I consenting for him to be on it as an investigator, and for him to turn and assail my position, and assail and insult me, and then eulogizing to the sky the Roman Catholic machine of the United States. Almost with tears welling up in his eyes he praised the Roman Catholics, but said not a word in praise of the fine Protestant men and women who served their country and their day and generation well. He never even mentioned George Washington, Master Mason, great American, who led in the establishment of our liberty and laid the corner stone of this Capitol. But he did not forget to eulogize the Roman Catholics.

I do not object to him eulogizing Catholics. Some of them are worthy of eulogy, and I have not assailed one of them who served his country faithfully. I am not talking about the Catholics generally of other days. I am talking about the deadly machine of Roman Catholicism, the Roman Catholic political machine of my day. It is moving menacingly upon the vitals of this Government. It is getting a strong hold in every department of Government here at Washington; and I, as a Senator, sent here by the people of Alabama to mark the approach of evil from any quarter, am giving facts—not fiction—to the Senate and the country. I have cited instances, and I told on yesterday about the Knights of Columbus of the United States, Roman Catholics, trying to get us into war with Mexico, and about a Roman Catholic Congressman from New York City introducing a resolution to declare the severance of diplomatic relations with Mexico.

The Senator from Arkansas could not dispute any of the facts I laid down, and I quoted the great French patriot, Lafayette, who gave to our forefathers the service of his sword, when he said in leaving this country, "If the liberties of America are ever lost, it will be through priests and nuns."

I have a right to quote these authors and statesmen and warriors of the past. That is my business as a Senator. It is none of the business of the Senator from Arkansas, and I resented his meddling with me and his undertaking to tell me what I should speak about. Nobody who has talked to me about the question has approved his position. The Senators in that conference this morning had it understood that this resolution and their support of it were in no way to rebuke me or my position, or to have any reference to our controversy. They were just expressing confidence in him as leader, and expressing their willingness for him to stay on the committee.

That is the truth about it in a nutshell; but they are going to have it flaming over the country in big headlines to-morrow that I was rebuked. I will tell you about it if they do. They are going to furnish me a lot of material now. They are going to give me a chance to put more facts in here before the Senate and the country, and I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas and to any other group who grow weary of my discussing the efforts of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to involve us in war that their position on the question does not affect me in the least. I am willing for them to feel as they please about it, but I have a duty to perform to my State and to the people of this country in keeping with the oath that I took when I stood at the altar place of this body, when I swore with my hand uplifted that I would defend my country against all enemies, both foreign and domestic. I will continue to pursue that course.

I will speak just as frequently on this question as I desire to speak. I am not surprised that the Democrats in the conference refused to do anything that could be construed into an attempt to handicap or hinder me in doing my duty in this matter. I am not surprised that they let it be known in that conference to-day that they could not pass any resolution seeking to censure my speech or criticize my position. I thank them. They are manly men, courageous men, but the very few who took advantage of my absence to speak harshly of me are cowardly Senators. They have not the courage to stand up before my face, not one of them, and say a thing disrespectful of me or against my honor.

They did not pass the resolution that some four or five wanted to pass. They had some "whereases" very nicely drawn that they wanted to lug in that would have the effect of convincing the public that I was rebuked, but the conference, thank God, spurned them, and they were not accepted.

Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate longer at this time. It will be a sad day for the Democratic Party whenever its leadership undertakes to tie up with Tammany and Al Smith, a wet, a nullifier, and a Roman Catholic. You were told in that conference this morning by an able Senator that if Al Smith were nominated, his State would go Republican.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. Was the Senator present in the conference?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir.

Mr. MOSES. From whom did he get this information?

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, the gall of the Senator from New Hampshire in asking me about our party secrets! [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is evidently not in possession of them.

Mr. HEFLIN. How is that? I did not catch that last statement. The Senator from New Hampshire wants to know what we Democrats do in private conference. You think you will get me to tell something we did in there, do you not?

Mr. MOSES. No; the Senator was not there; he does not know.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; of course; but I have been told.

Mr. MOSES. So have I. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I am not surprised. I would be surprised if the Senator does not know something about it. He is pretty shrewd and he has an inquiring mind and he finds out a heap that is going on around here, but we will take care of our own affairs over here.

I just want to say before I sit down that the Democratic conference this morning had a right to do what it did. I say again that I would not expect it to remove Senator ROBINSON as leader because of the suggestion I made and what he did on yesterday. They are not that much interested in this particular phase of the matter. They do not know all the circumstances in the matter. I repeat that in the main I have indorsed his leadership, but I appreciate the fact that in my absence it was generally understood by the Senators that no censure of me, no rebuke, was intended; that the resolution must not be construed into meaning that they were taking issue with me or my position in any shape, form, or fashion.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Yesterday the Senator took occasion to have an informal declaration on his side of the Chamber regarding the attitude of that party concerning its leadership. At the conclusion of the episode the Senator from Alabama announced that its party leader had been disapproved. Now, will the Senator be good enough to inform the Senate, the galleries, and the country as to exactly what took place in the conference this morning which the Senator did not attend?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have told the Senator and the Senate, and I am going to tell him again, because the Senator does not catch these things as quickly as some other Senators, but that is not my fault; it is the Almighty's fault. He did not treat the Senator right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. It may be that the caucuses or the conferences held by Senators on the other side of the Chamber are secret, but I have not understood and do not now understand that Democratic caucuses are secret organization meetings.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, Mr. President. I do not know what sort of monkey-wrench conventions they have over there, but I was not present this morning, as I said before, and I said I did not know that such a move would be made by Senator ROBINSON. I find since that Senator ROBINSON had written a note to me. My secretary phoned me and said I had a notice to come to a committee, and did not tell me what was in it. I found, after getting it, since I came to this Chamber, that he suggested and said, "In all good will and feeling I am going to bring this matter up," but I never got that note until the conference had adjourned.

But I will tell the Senator another thing that occurred. It seems that yesterday afternoon the Senators were under the impression that I was the mover, and if anything was brought before the conference that I would bring it there. In walking over to the Senate Office Building I came across the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON]. We talked a moment about this matter, and they suggested to me that if they were in my place, inasmuch as we had had our say and word battle on the floor, that they would not bring it before the conference. I said, "All right, I will not." Then I added as I went away, "I do not believe I will attend the conference." I thought the merchant marine matter was coming up.

I was not at the conference and I did not bring it up. It was brought up in my absence and several talks were made. My position was criticized by two or three Senators who are known to be antagonistic to me, especially on this Roman Catholic question, but the outcome of the conference was simply the acquiescence in the leadership of Senator ROBINSON and a willingness for him to remain on the committee. That was the action, as I said before, that I would expect them to take.

I am not aggrieved at that at all. The effort to rebuke me failed. The effort to censure me in any way failed utterly. The conference refused to pass a line that smacks of censure of me or my position. That is the truth of it. More than a dozen Senators have told me that.

I claim the right, Mr. President, to do what I feel it my duty to do regarding all public questions. I will continue to claim that right, and I am going to speak—I want to give notice now—from time to time upon what I regard as a great evil and overshadowing issue before the American people. I am not asleep. There is not enough power amongst them to silence me unless they poison me or murder me. I am going to continue to make my fight. I have a duty to perform, and I am going to perform it at all hazards. No rebuke, I do not care how it is brought about, how much Roman Catholic influence is brought to bear, how many peculiar circumstances point to a movement among them to have a Protestant Senator attack another Protestant Senator on this floor—none of those things will feaze me. I am going to discharge my duty as I see it, and as God gives me the light to see it and the strength to carry it out.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Alabama had no sufficient notice of the conference of his party called for this morning, although the Senator was present on the floor yesterday. On page 1661 of the RECORD for yesterday I find a formal notice from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of the Democratic Party in this Chamber, in which he said:

> I am going to call a conference to-morrow, and I challenge the Senator from Alabama to come before the conference and move the election of another leader for the Democratic Party of the Senate.

The Senator from Alabama, Mr. President, evidently disregarded that challenge. He admits that he was not present, charging it, I suppose, upon the dereliction of the Senate post office for not having brought to him the courteous note which the Senator from Arkansas addressed to him.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. MOSES. Just a moment, please. The Senator from Alabama, however, not having been present at the conference, undertakes to state what took place there. It will be readily understood by Senators on both sides of the Chamber that I was not present in the Democratic conference, but I have some knowledge of what took place there. I understand that the vote which was taken to express the confidence of the Democratic side of the Chamber in its leader resulted in a vote of 34 to 1, the one vote in the negative being explained by the Senator who cast it in saying that he fully approved of the course of his leader, but he did not wish to do it in voting to approve a resolution. In other words, Mr. President, the only ally of the Senator from Alabama wished to keep it a dark secret.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the efforts of one of the leaders on the Republican side to come to the rescue of Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas. I stated that when Senator OVERMAN and Senator TYSON suggested to me not to bring this thing up, that I agreed to it. Senator ROBINSON suggested that I bring it up. I had already told two Senators that I would not bring it up and that I would not be there, and I have already stated the facts about the matter. The Senator said the vote was 34 to 1. I repeatedly stated here that I would expect them to vote that way; that one said he would not vote for it because somebody might construe it to mean that it was a reflection on me, and all the others, or most of them—all but about five or six—said "No; nothing like that is involved in it; not at all"; but they voted for it with the understanding that I was not to be rebuked in any way and that they were not saying that they did not like my position or my speech. Those are the facts about it, and I do not care to talk about it more at this time, but I repeat that I will discuss various phases of a great evil in this country and a great danger from time to time. I will discuss Alfred Smith. I do not have to go to the Senator from Arkansas to get permission from him as to whether I can talk about Al Smith or not. He is a public man. He is the governor of a State. He is a candidate for President.

Mr. MOSES. And bound to be your nominee.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; he is not bound to be our nominee. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] a few days ago told the Senate that Al Smith was going to be nominated and was going to be elected.

Mr. MOSES. With one of those positions I agree.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Arkansas, the Democratic leader, never called him down for speaking about Al Smith favorably, but when I say he will not be nominated——

Mr. MOSES. In which the Senator from Alabama is wrong.

Mr. HEFLIN. And he will not be elected, I am lectured by the Senator from Arkansas.

The first man who brought the name of Al Smith into this body was one of his boosters, the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. He was predicting his nomination and triumphant election, and when I come along and give some reasons why he will not be nominated and will not be elected, the Senator from Arkansas criticized me and endeavored to lecture me. I have gone all over that and I want to repeat in the hearing of the Senator from Arkansas that I would not expect the conference to take any other action than it did, to express confidence in his leadership, and that I indorse his leadership, in the main. I would not expect them to remove him for the terrible mistake and blunder and outrageous performance that he committed here on yesterday. I would not expect them to remove him from leadership or for them to take him off of the committee. So, with the understanding before this body and before the galleries—thank God the people who come here can not be silenced exactly yet, because they have conscience and courage, too, and they are interested in their country.

I would not expect the Senator from Arkansas to be taken off of the committee on account of what transpired here yesterday.

I repeat that those two Senators suggested, in response to the challenge of the Senator from Arkansas to me to bring it up in the conference, that I should not do it, that I ought not to bring it up, and I told them all right, I would not bring it up. I did not go even to the conference, thinking that if I did not bring it up it would not be brought up, but the outcome of it is perfectly agreeable to me. The leadership of the Senator from Arkansas, I repeat, in the main is satisfactory to me and, so far as his removal from this committee is concerned, my part in the scandalous charges is over. The committee has exonerated me. No committee of honorable Senators could have done otherwise. Some Senators said, "Oh, well, you have been exonerated by the committee and we did not feel like making an issue with him and taking him off the committee or removing him from his leadership because of that," and that is all right with me, so far as the conference is concerned. That is all right; it is all right with me, but I will say that if I had been on the committee and the Senator from Arkansas had been one of the accused and he had expressed his objection to my being on it, I would have risen in my place in the Senate and tendered my resignation.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. DALE. If the Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, I am willing to yield to him.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to yield to me, except to suggest that it does not make any difference what Senator first addresses the Chair, the Chair may recognize any Senator he pleases.

Mr. MOSES. I understand that. I occupy the chair often enough to know that. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought not to object to getting some of his own medicine.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that the Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I have been much interested in the reference which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] made to the full galleries. I understand perfectly that the population of Washington know that the Senate at times is much more interesting and much cheaper than are the "movies" and consequently they come here.

I have been interested also in the references which the Senator from Alabama has made to the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is not here at the moment. I will not try to speak in defense of the Senator from New York whatever his position at the moment may be, because I recall that once in a public speech he described the present Governor of the great Commonwealth of New York as "the political armless Venus de Milo." I am not sure whether or not that characterization will go forward into the approaching campaign.

I am much more interested in the prophecy of the Senator from Alabama, a prophecy one portion of which he can make with great exactitude; that is, that he will return to this subject. We know that he will, Mr. President. We know that he will make the same speech over and over again, and between now and whatever time in June we may adjourn we shall get most of it by heart.

I am, however, surprised to confront the complete and abject surrender which the Senator from Alabama has made since yesterday afternoon. Then he breathed out fire and slaughter here, defied the leader of his party, bared his breast to the barbs of any ecclesiastical combination which might be brought together, admitted his willingness to submit himself to the dagger or the poison cup, and now this morning recants everything. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have recanted nothing. When the Senator from New Hampshire says I have recanted he states that which he knows is not true.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE ON LINDEN-LEXINGTON ROAD, TENNESSEE

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, if the Senate can take the time to transact a little business this afternoon, I should like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the very important matter of a bill respecting the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator be given leave to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the request, Mr. President?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the request of the Senator from Vermont is merely that he may report and that there may be passed a bridge bill for the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not object, for this is the last day on which the legislation can be passed in order that the work may be continued.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; do not object. Tennessee being a Democratic State, let them have the bridge.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not any objection to the passage of the bill, but it seems to me that as some Senators desire to leave this evening and others desire to speak on the subject that is pending, we ought not to take up the time of the Senate in the consideration of other matters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I repeat that this is the last day on which the bill may be passed if it is to have any effect, and its passage will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DALE. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6053) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Linden-Lexington road, in Perry and Decatur Counties, Tenn., and I submit a report (No. 101) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 112) opposing the seating of FRANK L. SMITH as a Senator from the State of Illinois, reported from the special committee investigating senatorial campaign expenditures.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires recognition, I presume I am entitled to get it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, now that I have the floor I hope that no Senator will claim the floor away from me.

At the beginning of the eloquent address of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], I propounded to him a question. He said he would try to answer it during the course of his remarks, but, although he occupied nearly two hours and a half, he made no answer.

The first sentence of the Senator's address was to the effect in substance that he had no doubt the Senate had the power to exclude Mr. SMITH, but that the Senate did not derive such power from the Constitution of the United States. Will the Senator tell us where the Senate did get it? That is the question that is yet unanswered.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from California and other Senators who preceded him on yesterday, that the question the Senate will pass upon is one of great importance. I agree also that it is not a question of personalities; I agree with him when he says that the personality of the man who is knocking at the door of the Senate should have nothing to do with our votes on the proposition involved; but he goes on to tell us, as other Senators have told us, giving illustrations which I think were not apt, that in refusing to permit Mr. SMITH to take the oath of office pending the decision of his case we were violating a constitutional provision and denying to the State of Illinois proper representation in this body. The Senator from California went so far as to say that if in the various constitutional conventions which had been held to ratify the Constitution of the United States any one had there suggested that we would keep a Senator from taking the oath of office while we considered his case the Constitution never could have been ratified. Then, either the Senator from California or some other Senator, to illustrate how we were violating the Constitution, called attention to what took place in the Brookhart case, where, he said, the man with a certificate of election was sworn in and the investigation and the action of the Senate took place afterwards.

When he cited the Brookhart case as a reason why we should administer the oath to Mr. SMITH, I was refused—I think it was by the Senator from Conecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]—an opportunity to ask him a question. He knew very well that the illustration which he had given would not apply; he knew very well that the pending case was no more like the Brookhart case and had no more to do with the Brookhart case than the flowers that bloom in the springtime. A certificate of election is nothing but prima facie evidence of what it purports to state; everybody admits that; I have not heard in the discussion either here or elsewhere a denial of the proposition that the certificate of election is nothing but prima facie evidence. In the Brookhart case and in the Newberry case certificates were presented, and the Senate had no other official evidence of any kind or character except the certificate of election.

The Senator from California, great lawyer that he is, said that in the Newberry case, while there was nothing before the Senate but the certificate of election presented, yet everybody knew what the facts were. If that statement had come from a lawyer in some police court or before a country justice of the peace we might forgive it or overlook it, but hardly so in the case of the great Senator from California. He knows that we had no official knowledge of any kind in the Newberry case except the certificate of election. He knows that in the Brookhart case we had no official notice of any kind except the certificate of election, and he knows also that in the pending case, before Mr. SMITH ever presented his certificate of election, before we ever had any official notice that there was a certificate of election, the Senate had already taken action; that it had already appointed its committee; that its committee had gone forth and taken evidence; that Mr. SMITH himself appeared as a witness before that committee, and that committee reported its findings to the Senate, which were on file before the certificate of election was ever presented. So the truth of this prima facie evidence, the certificate of election, was denied and contradicted before it was ever officially presented to the Senate of the United States. That is the difference between these cases. That places this case by itself. If we had not made that investigation, if there had been no official notice before the Senate except the certificate of election, there would not have been a Senator here who would have objected to the taking of the oath of office.

There is not any use in trying to bandy words; there is not any use in trying to get a false impression before the Senate and through the Senate before the country; there is not any doubt about what actually has occurred; there is not any dispute that the prima facie evidence afforded by the certificate of election was denied and that the evidence that was taken in denial stands undisputed by Mr. SMITH himself. That evidence is that more than $400,000 was spent to secure his nomination; that $125,000 of that amount, and a little more than that, were contributed by one man, Mr. Insull, who is the owner of electric-light companies, street railways, and public utilities of various kinds; that Mr. SMITH accepted that money while he was chairman of the Public Service Commission of the State of Illinois, and that it was the duty of that commission to supervise and control not only the rates but the rules and the regulations governing the operation of the public-utility properties in Illinois which were owned by Mr. Insull and his partners. All that stands undisputed.

So in the Newberry case, if we are going to use that as a precedent—and I think we can, for it is the latest one—it was decided by the Senate in the third paragraph of the resolution which dismissed the Newberry contest and seated Mr. Newberry, as follows:

> That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.
> The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and the dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severally condemned and disapproved.

The Senator from California was in the Senate, and voted for that proposition. He stands of record as favoring that proposition; but now he is making an argument—as, indeed, have the other Senators who have spoken in behalf of Mr. SMITH—that the Senate is helpless; that no matter what may be the condition or what may be the facts as to the fraud, the debauchery, the crime, if you want to put it that way, that may have been committed in order to get this nomination and this election, no matter how the hands of the candidate may be tainted, we are bound to administer the oath of office and accept him as a Member of the Senate.

Mr. President, the Senator from California has made reference to the Constitutional Convention and to the conventions of the various States that approved the Constitution. Let me add to what he said that at the time of those conventions it was not known that this country, in the space of a comparatively short length of time, was going to have trusts, combinations, and multimillionaires who would have money enough to buy primaries and buy conventions and buy elections and win their way, through fraud and the expenditure of money, into the Senate of the United States. Had they ever known it they would have added something; they would have put in something that would have been a direct prohibition; but in their wisdom they did put in a provision, and that is the provision in Article I, section 5:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

That means that the Senate is supreme; it is the supreme court; it has jurisdiction of this question. It has been given jurisdiction by the direct words of the Constitution itself. There is no appeal. It is the supreme court, and its judgment is final; and its authority comes from the Constitution in those direct words. Are we going to say now—in fact, it is said by those who favor the admission of Mr. SMITH—"Why, if we establish this precedent the Senate may some time exclude a man because he is a Catholic, or because he is a Protestant, or because he has red hair"; in other words, they might some time abuse this power that is given them.

In answer to that, I want to say that it is true. They might; they may; but it must follow, as night follows day, that there is not a power conferred upon any official, upon any tribunal, upon any legislature or any commission in our Constitution but that can be abused in the same way; and if that power is final, like the jurisdiction given to the Supreme Court, then there is no appeal.

If the Senators who are thus arguing now had been in the Constitutional Convention they would have opposed the establishment of the Supreme Court of the United States, because it could have been said, "Why, suppose this Supreme Court goes wrong; there is no help. They might decide a case contrary to the law, contrary to the evidence." They might. Everybody must admit that they might. They would have opposed the establishment of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, because it could be said, "Why, this House of Representatives, to which is given the primary power, the original jurisdiction to originate certain bills, may never originate them. It may become corrupt, and therefore we must not have any House of Representatives. The Senate might refuse to appropriate money to carry on the Government of the United States." We might become so corrupt that we would decline to appropriate for the judges and the marshals and the Army and the Navy and the President, and thus cripple and ultimately overthrow our country.

That is all true. That is all within the bounds of possibility; but is that any reason why we should not have a Senate? In fact, if you are going to be that critical you will fail to establish any power, any government anywhere. Anarchy will be bound to reign supreme.

It is true, Mr. President, that sometimes these powers have been abused. This particular power has been given to the Senate. It might have been placed somewhere else by our forefathers. They might have given it to a commission, or to the courts; but they did not. They gave it to us and it is beyond our power to escape from that responsibility. Try as we will, we are shouldered with the responsibility of meeting this question. We can not, we dare not evade it. It is up to us. We must decide it, because the Constitution has placed that jurisdiction and that power in our hands, and in our hands exclusively.

Powers have been abused. We have an illustration of that in the Capital City of the Nation now, where the power that has been given to the courts has been abused. A spectacle is going on down here in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and has been going on for 6 or 10 weeks, that must bring the blush of shame to every citizen of the United States who believes in the proper administration of the laws and the proper trial of cases before courts. We saw a millionaire—that was the case of a millionaire, like the one that is involved here—defying the laws of the United States. We saw Mr. Sinclair go on trial, and it developed that he had hired a whole lot of detectives from New York and Baltimore and Philadelphia and Washington, and that they were following the members of the jury. That fact was brought to the attention of the court and the court discharged the jury. It declared a mistrial after enormous amounts of money had been expended, after the Government had gone on for weeks with its case. The court practically held there, when it discharged that jury, that somebody—whoever was to blame for following up the jury—was guilty of contempt of court. Then, after waiting a week or two, the same judge appointed a committee to prosecute these people, when as a matter of fact all that it would have been necessary for him to do, and what he ought to have done, assuming that his decision in discharging the jury was right, was to say, "These defendants will be given until to-morrow morning, or the next day," or whatever time he had a mind to fix—two hours would have been enough; the evidence was all in—"to show why they should not be held in contempt of court."

Instead of that, however, after waiting for a week or 10 days he finally appointed a committee to prosecute them; and then, when in good faith they started out to follow the directions to prosecute these fellows who had been guilty of following the jury—this millionaire who had money enough to hold up even the Government of the United States—when they got fairly started with it the judge turned around, instead of trying the defendants, and tried the prosecuting attorney; and, from what I can see as it goes along, I think he is about to find him guilty, and find the defendants not guilty.

That is an instance of the abuse of power. It is a striking illustration of it. I know no escape from it. We can not have a Government unless we confide the power to somebody. The Senate at some time may make a mistake; but somebody must pass on this question, and I think, Senators, that we have presented to us here a fundamental proposition—one that goes to the very roots not only of our Government but of every democratic form of government on earth.

It is not a question of Illinois being deprived of her two votes in the Senate; it is a question of Mr. Insull being deprived of his votes in the Senate. The senatorial toga has been put upon the auction block. He has bought it; he has paid for it, and he is here at the doors demanding his property; and these Senators who are arguing so eloquently and forcefully are asking the Senate to give it to him. If he has a right to buy it, if he has a right to do what it is admitted he has done, then we are wrong and you are right. Then we ought to admit SMITH; and, if we do, we ought to put a sign on the door saying, "Seats for sale in this body to the Electric Light Trust or other combinations of wealth for $450,000 each." That is what you would have us do. That is the effect of admitting SMITH.

We are about to investigate, I hope, or the committee provided for in the resolution is about to investigate, the so-called Water Power Trust. Insull is a part of it. He is being deprived here of his legitimate rights in this body that he has bought and paid for, and he does not like it. Perhaps we are doing wrong by taking them away from him; but Illinois is not the only State where he mixes up. It is not the only place where the great Water Power Trust is making contributions to campaigns. I do not know how many he is in; but I have before me here a copy of The Nation of December 21, 1927, and on page 710 of that magazine is an article entitled "Maine's water-power fight," by Earl Sparling. I am going to read you some extracts from it.

It says, in the first place—

For two years Samuel Insull—

That is the same fellow who is knocking at the door here for his man to take a seat—

Samuel Insull, the Chicago power and political magnate, has been battling in Maine for what is called the greatest water-power prize in New England. Mr. Insull did not start the quarrel. He only inherited it. But the voters of Maine, of whom there are still a few, are beginning to realize just what that means.

The voters were asked with some ceremony on October 18 last to vote their voting privilege into limbo. The irony of the request did not go unnoticed. About 30 per cent of the voting population reported to the polls, and the proposed abolition of the State's direct-primary system was defeated by a vote of something like two to one.

Insull, the story shows—it probably is not new to any of us—Insull, in order to get the power he wanted, in order to get the right to use the water power of Maine, found that it was necessary to get rid of the direct primary in the State of Maine, and he started out to do it; and that is the fight that this article is talking about.

Mr. CARAWAY. He found primaries rather expensive, did he not?

Mr. NORRIS. He found them expensive, and he found them expensive in Illinois.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I was talking about.

Mr. NORRIS. If it had been a convention, he could have bought them for much less. Let me pause right here, while I think of it, to answer another argument that has been made that I am reminded of now—that after the primary, when all these facts were known, the people of Illinois voted for SMITH and gave him a majority of the votes at the general election.

They say, therefore, that it does not make any difference what his sin was, the people of Illinois knew it, and they elected him in the face of it. What are the facts about it? Everybody knows that in the State of Illinois the Republican nomination is almost the same as an election. In this case, however, the Democratic nominee for Senator was also a man to whose campaign Insull had likewise contributed. He took no chances. It was a proposition of heads he won and tails the other fellow lost.

Mr. BORAH. It ought to be said, however, that he contributed only $15,000 to the Democratic nominee.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a difference in the doctrine of chances. He assumed, as any shrewd man would, that the chances were that SMITH was going to be elected; but if SMITH were not elected, then a Democrat would be. Or he might have found out that it did not take as much money to buy the Democrat as to buy the Republican; I do not know. Anyway, he gave the Democrat $15,000 and he gave the Republican $125,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. Incidentally, he invested on both sides of the World Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. He took no chances on anything. Wherever there were two sides to a question, he bought both.

Mr. NORRIS. He bought them both. What was a man to do in Illinois, Mr. President? It is said they elected SMITH, anyway, in the face of it. They only had a choice between two evils, and although an independent man was running the fear was that if a man did not vote for SMITH, if he voted, let us say, for the independent, the Democrat might be elected, a man who was considered by many of the Republicans, probably a majority of them, as much worse than SMITH.

So it came back to the proposition that the voters of Illinois were helpless. When this man had bought both sides of the election he could go on fishing, as far as the election was concerned. He had it then. He owned everything in sight. He bought it and paid for it, and it was his; it did not make any difference to him what happened in the election.

Now, let me read some more of what happened in Maine.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just one minute. To show how the utilities work in the primaries, Mr. Studebaker, who lives in Indiana and votes in Indiana, and never did vote in Illinois, also invested in Mr. SMITH'S campaign in Illinois.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he did.

Mr. CARAWAY. Because he had utilities.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. And violated the law of Illinois, which required the removal from office of a man occupying the office that Mr. SMITH occupied who accepted a contribution, did it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what we are doing here in the Senate; we are just enforcing the law of Illinois.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all. This article says further on—I am not reading all of it:

The Maine power fight actually started in 1909, but it gathered momentum after Mr. Insull began to buy up Maine power properties two years ago. Mr. Insull to-day controls companies reputed to own two-thirds of the State's total developed water power. And to-day the Republican Party in Maine is divided into two opposing camps. The fight for and against the primary has been one of the chief results of this split.

I call attention to that only to show that if we are going so far as to say that Mr. Insull, when he buys a State, is thereby entitled to two votes in the Senate of the United States, we ought to remember that he is doing business in a lot of States, and he has the same right to ask that he control the senatorial votes in Maine, probably, that he does in Illinois.

How about Kentucky? How about Ohio? Will he want to claim the right to cast two votes of Ohio's Senators in the Senate? If he buys them, if we forgive this offense, if we let this go, if we establish a precedent here that we are going to give to him the thing he has bought, then why has he not a right to go into any other State, into my State, into your State, Mr. President, and buy the senatorial toga and come here and demand that his servants, his hirelings, be sworn into office to carry out his will and his wish?

Mr. CARAWAY. He will soon be able to break a quorum, will he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he could break a quorum whenever he wanted to.

Mr. President, I feel as the Senator from California does, very deeply on this subject. We are going to establish a precedent one way or the other. Either we shall approve the resolution that was adopted in the Newberry case, and say to these powers, these trusts, these combinations, these multimillionaires, "You can get the courts, perhaps, in some instances, you can get the executive department, you can stay the hand of justice in a criminal trial, but you can not buy the Senate of the United States. It, at least, stands in the road, in the way, of this kind of combination controlling the Government of our country."

If we are to establish this precedent, if we are to permit the sale of seats to take place here, what will be the next that will happen? Everybody knows that if elections are bought with money, or secured by deception, the result is just the same as though you took it at the hands of an army, at the point of the bayonet—you have disfranchised the honest voters of the country; you have taken away the fundamental corner stone of this democracy; you have said that, although we are supposed to give to the citizens of this country the right to vote and the right to have their votes counted, the right of a free government, yet, nevertheless, that is only true in name, we are selling you out, we are going to turn you over to those who have money enough to buy seats in the United States Senate.

Are you going to make it as cheap to buy a seat here as they supposed it was to buy a member of the Cabinet and to get millions of dollars' worth of Government oil? Do you suppose that if we had had a Senate composed of men who owed their elections here to men like Insull, you would ever have had an investigation of Teapot Dome? Do you suppose you would ever have ferreted out any of the evidence that finally resulted in the trial of Daugherty and in the conviction of Miller in the Federal courts of the United States? It was in the Senate, the last place left that was free and untarnished, in which those things were commenced. While most of them have not been successful as yet, not successful because of the power of multimillionaires, as I have described one that is taking place in this District, yet, if the Senate had been composed of men such as this precedent would put into seats here, then nothing would have been developed, and from the White House down to the janitor, through it all, we would have been subject to the control of gold.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I am unwilling for the vote to be taken on this resolution without giving in brief the reasons upon which I base my conclusion and consequently shall cast my vote.

I concede at the outset that two views may well be taken, either one of which may be founded upon precedent in this body. It is a question, therefore, of which is the better view; that is, which view should govern the Senate in this case. I shall not undertake to go into an extended argument nor an analysis of the several cases constituting precedents. That has been done by others, and perhaps all that can be said on that subject has been said already.

As I view the question, it immediately resolves itself into two factors. The first is the power of the Senate; that is, whether the Senate possesses the naked power to reject a Senator elect for any reason and on any account beyond the disqualifications named in the third section of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

I am not a stranger to the doctrine that all parts of a statute or constitution should be construed together in order to give harmonious effect to all of its provisions. I am also aware of the rule of construction that one part of a statute or constitution should not be restricted or abridged by another part of it unless it is necessary to do so in order to harmonize and render effective the entire document.

Mr. President, with that in view, it is my opinion that section 5, reading as follows—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members—should not be restricted or abridged by the language found in section 3 unless it is necessary to do so in order to harmonize the two provisions and give effect to both of them.

I find no difficulty in harmonizing the two provisions without restricting section 5 of the constitutional provision, because section 3 is a restriction or a limitation of power upon the States. I care not where that restriction emanated or from what source it comes. It has been said that the States restricted themselves in this regard by their ratification of the Constitution. It has been said that the Constitution itself restricts the States in that regard. I care not which argument is adopted, the States are restricted by section 3.

It is a restriction voluntarily assumed and imposed upon the States. It is a restriction negative in character, involving three elements—that is, that no State shall elect a Member to this body unless he shall have attained the age of 30 years, unless he has been nine years a citizen of the United States and unless at the time of his election he was an inhabitant of the State from which he comes. These are limitations placed upon the States in order to produce uniformity in the membership of this body. I repeat, for emphasis, that these limitations are negative in character. It is significant, as has been said repeatedly during the course of this debate, that the language as originally drafted was positive in character, and gave every man who had reached the age of 30 years and who had been nine years a citizen of the country, and who was at the time of his election an inhabitant of the State, the right to be elected as a Member of this body. But for some reason the constitutional convention reversed the order and stated the language negatively in form.

It has been repeated time and time again in decisions from the courts throughout this country that when there is a radical change in the language of statutory or constitutional provisions the body enacting those provisions intended to inaugurate some positive change, some new policy, and a new course to be followed. So that I call upon those who find themselves on the opposite side of this question to explain to the Senate why the constitutional convention, when first vesting the absolute power in any citizen who met those three qualifications to be elected to this body, afterwards reversed the order and merely imposed a restriction upon the States by saying that no State should elect a man to this body unless he had reached the age of 30 years, was 9 years a citizen of this country, and an inhabitant of the State.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRATTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that after the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention in 1787 the then States ratified that Constitution, and that thereafter, when Illinois became a State, she became a party to that ratification and thereby subscribed to the doctrine as set down in the original Constitution?

Mr. BRATTON. Precisely so. Section 3 prescribes disqualifications and not qualifications. It is directed to the States of the Union. It imposes limitations upon them by forbidding that they elect a man to this body who has not met those three requirements. But section 5 is directed to the Senate of the United States and is a grant of power instead of a restriction of power. There the power is vested in the Senate to judge of the election and qualifications of its Members. Unless it is necessary to attach section 3 to section 5 and regard it as a limitation upon section 5 in order to give effect to both provisions of the Constitution, under all the rules of construction, it ought not to be construed in that way. In other words, if section 3 were omitted from the Constitution, no Member would contend on the floor of the Senate that there was any limitation upon the power of the Senate to reject a Senator elect for any reason which in its judgment renders him ineligible to a seat in this body. And so, unless section 3 is necessarily a limitation and proscription upon the power of the Senate by confining it to the three things named in section 3, this body is without limitation in that regard.

What I have said with reference to the rule of interpretation that should apply in this case is strengthened by the historical fact to which I have already adverted, namely, that the constitutional convention for some reason reversed the language from positive in character to negative in type, merely placing restrictions upon the States by saying that they shall not send one to this body unless he has met those three requirements.

So, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that so far as the naked power is concerned the Senate has the right to reject one for other grounds than the disqualifications named in section 3. It may be that the Senate should be confined to those three considerations, but after deliberating upon the question at length I have reached the conclusion that if that should be the law of the land, it will require a constitutional amendment to bring it about.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The statement has been repeatedly made in discussing this case that all the Senate can do and all the makers of the Constitution ever contemplated it should do, in determining the qualifications of one who sought admission, was to ascertain whether he had reached the required age and whether he had resided for the required number of years in the United States and whether he was a citizen of the State from which he came. It was said that if the makers of the Constitution and the States in ratifying it had thought that any other powers were given to the Senate, there would have been no Constitution. The Senator recalls that statement?

Mr. BRATTON. Very distinctly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If that was in their minds, why did they put in the Constitution the provision that there should be no religious test? It shows that they did realize there was a very large power vested and they sought to limit it. That is the only positive test, that we can not proscribe a man for religious reasons, so it shows clearly that they did have in their minds that there was a power that could be exercised, and they left it open to be exercised, except they said, "You shall not do it for these reasons."

Mr. BRATTON. Undoubtedly the observations made by the Senator from Arkansas are sound.

I return to complete what I intended to say with reference to the first part of the subject involved; that is, that the Senate has the power to go beyond an inquiry as to whether a Senator designate or a Senator elect is more than 30 years of age; it has the power to go beyond the inquiry as to whether he has been nine years a citizen of the United States; it has the power to go beyond an inquiry as to whether he is an inhabitant of the State from which he comes. It has the power, under section 5 of the Constitution, to go beyond those three subjects, and may investigate other things which enter into his qualifications and to judge of those qualifications.

An inquiry was propounded yesterday by the able Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], whom I admire very much, to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as to what significance he gave to the word "judge." If the Senate is impaled by the limitations contained in section 3, as contended by the Senator from California, it would not be the judge of scarcely anything. The governor of the State who issues the certificate would for all practical purposes be the judge of the qualifications of the Senator elect.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will permit me, the Senate of course is the judge of those elements of eligibility. The Senate has in many cases judged whether a man was a citizen for the requisite period. They might judge of the question of citizenship as they could have judged of Henry Clay when he came here and was not 30 years of age, or they might judge of the question of inhabitancy or, under the other section, they could inquire whether he was an officer of the Government.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me inquire of my friend from California as to why he thinks the framers of the Constitution reversed the language from positive in nature to negative in type?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I attach no great importance to that. Any one going over the debates as reported will observe that when the committee on style was appointed and that committee set about to put the document in its final form many changes were made that put the thought merely in different words. In this case they put it in its negative instead of in its affirmative form. I do not want to interrupt the Senator further, but I do wish to say that that is the form which we find in practically every State constitution. In the Newberry case the Supreme Court put the direct question, "Who is eligible to vote for Representatives in the conference," and their answer was in the very language of the Constitution. Then they put the question, "Who is eligible for the election?" and they proceed to answer it in the very language of the Constitution.

Mr. BRATTON. I thank my friend from California for his observation.

Mr. President, even at the risk of repetition I say that if section 5 stood alone, providing that each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, no one in this body would contend that the power of the Senate is restricted in any sense, but the Senate would be free to reject for any reason which, in the judgment of the Members of this body, was sufficient. I continue to say that section 3 should not be construed as a restriction upon section 5, as limiting or restricting the power of the Senate in a matter of this kind, unless it is necessary to do so in order to harmonize both provisions of the Constitution and to give effect to each of them.

I believe that is a rule of construction which will not be questioned by any Member of this body. With that well in mind, when we consider that section 3 is directed to the States and is a limitation upon the States, prescribing that no State shall elect one to membership in this body unless he shall have arrived at the age of 30 years, unless he shall have been nine years a citizen of the country, unless he shall be an inhabitant of his State—when we keep steadily in mind that that provision is a limitation of power upon the States, I am unable to subscribe to the doctrine that it can be extended to become a limitation upon the grant of power directed to the Senate and found in section 5. No other interpretation will serve as a foundation for the argument that the Senate is limited to an inquiry into the three questions—of age, citizenship, and inhabitancy.

So, Mr. President, keeping in mind the rules of interpretation which I have endeavored to mention briefly, and I am doing so briefly on account of the lateness of the hour and the circumstances under which we proceed, I think the one provision is a grant of power to the Senate and the other is a limitation of power upon the States, and that the limitation of power upon the States does not operate as a restriction of the grant of power to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, if I am correct in my view that the Senate possesses the power, the next question is the time and manner of its exercise. It has been argued repeatedly that the power should not be exercised until after the oath has been administered, when the proceeding would become one to expel. With that I find myself not in accord.

I have been unable to find any language in the Constitution that even states indirectly or by a fair inference that a Senator designate or a Senator elect must be admitted into this body before the Senate has jurisdiction or power to reject. I grant that in the ordinary case, where a Senator elect appears with his credentials fair upon their face constituting a prima facie title to the office, he ought to be entitled to receive the oath and sit in the body until it has been determined that he is not entitled to membership here. In any ordinary case I would vote to seat the Senator elect subject to the inquiry afterwards.

But, Mr. President, this is an unusual case. It is not an ordinary one. This is an exceptional case. Long before the certificate of election issued, long before the prima facie title made by the certificate ever came into existence an arm of the Senate itself reached out, clothed with authority to take sworn testimony and to bring it into this body. The committee of the Senate took testimony. The charges were well defined and well known. The now Senator elect appeared before the committee, he sat by, watched the proceedings, understood the charges, and did not avail himself then or thereafter, or at any time up until now, of even registering a substantial denial of those grave charges. I am unable to say that the testimony taken by the committee does not overthrow the mere prima facie title contained in the certificate of election. I think it does so.

That is all the certificate is; it is merely prima facie evidence of his right to the office. Is the Senate to look to the certificate alone and close its eyes to the testimony taken; close its eyes to the fact that, although the Senator elect sat in the presence of the committee and knew for months the grave nature of the charges, he has even until now failed to enter a general denial of them. It seems to me, Mr. President, it is going too far to say that the Senate must close its eyes to those facts and administer the oath, and that thereafter we become possessed of the power to inquire into the facts and to dismiss the Member from this body. I am unable to permit technicalities of procedure on questions of that kind to close my eyes to the merits of the case.

I have said all that I care to say on the subject. I do not desire to enter into it from a controversial standpoint. I merely wanted to give the reasons upon which I have reached the conclusion that the Senate has the power to reject a Senator elect at the rail of the Senate under the facts as we have them before us to-day, and to do that upon other grounds than those named in negative form as limitations upon the States with respect to the election of persons to that office.

So far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to close my eyes to the fact that an extremely large contribution was made in violation of a positive statute of the State of Illinois subjecting the Senator elect to removal from the office that he then occupied. I am unwilling to say that that is beyond the pale of consideration here until we shall have administered the oath, and that then, and not until then, does the Senate of the United States possess the power to investigate such a situation, when there is not a word or a syllable in the Constitution which by express language or fair intendment can be said to restrict the Senate and cause it to stand by inert and helpless to protect itself and the country.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I only desire to say a few words. I should not do that were it not for the importance which I attach to the particular question on which the Senate is about to vote.

I agree in general with everything that my colleague from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] has said and with everything that has been said by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, than whom I believe no man deserves better of the Republic.

I am going to speak for a few moments in order to explain why I can not agree with the conclusions which the Senator from Nebraska and other Senators who support the pending resolution have apparently reached.

So far as the constitutional and legal aspects of this matter are concerned, I believe the Senate has complete power to act. I am not certain whether the framers of the Constitution intended to convey that power to us, but we have the power, because, so far as practical matters go, there is no appeal from our decision on questions affecting membership. I concede that this honorable body, if it chooses, may by a majority vote declare every seat in this Chamber vacant and that there is no other body in the United States or anywhere else which could reverse our decision. For that reason I am not going to speak of power; I am going to speak of rights, and when I say rights, I am referring to moral rights and not to legal or constitutional rights.

The greater our power the more incumbent it is on us to use that power in accordance with principles, and precedent, and orderly procedure. In a case like this where a moral issue has been raised—and I submit that even a young Senator may be allowed to speak about morals—we have got to get down to bedrock. We are not here as the masters of the people, Mr. President; we are here as their servants, their employees. The people have a right, so long as they abide by the laws laid down by Congress and by the Constitution, to elect any representatives they may choose. I think it is up to us, on the other hand, to decide what laws we shall impose on the States in order to see that the men whom they do choose shall live up to our conception of the dignity and responsibility of the senatorial office.

I admit that Senators are national officers; yet they are national officers chosen in a particular way under the National Constitution and the laws of the United States. They are national officers chosen by the States directly as their representatives. The Members of the House of Representatives may in a more direct way represent the people, but I submit that the Senate represents primarily the individual States and that, outside of certain particular emergencies, we, in determining the membership of this body, should follow the Constitution and follow the decisions of those individual States.

Mr. President, on that basis I think there are only two reasons why the Senate should ever override a decision of a State which has selected a man to represent it here. One is that he did not have the qualifications provided by the Constitution; and the second is the election was so corrupted, that the individual voters were so worked on by money or other improper means, that the man who comes here purporting to be their representative is not the representative of the State which sent him.

There is a third reason which may not be valid, but which is at least plausible, and that is that the voters of a State were so deceived in one way or another that they did not know the character of the man for whom they were voting, and so elected him under a misapprehension.

Mr. President, I am going to assume the accuracy of all the facts which are reported by the special committee. I think they are pretty serious facts for us to consider. The main one, of course, is that Mr. SMITH, being chairman of the Illinois Public Service Commission, which was empowered to regulate the rates, the charges, and the business of public utility corporations in that State, accepted from Samuel Insull and other power, traction, and public-utility magnates, a large sum of money as a contribution to his primary campaign expenses. I do not think that it is necessary to characterize an action like that. It is about as bad as anything that I can conceive being perpetrated in this Republic. I think it is equivalent to a judge taking a bribe from a man who appears before his court. I think it would disqualify a man from sitting in any society of gentlemen. If I valued my own opinion as to such an action more than I do the opinion of the people of Illinois, I should unhesitatingly say that this man was unfit to sit in the Senate of the United States.

On the other hand, there is no allegation that any United States law has been violated. There has been, as I see it, no fraud. I am not using "fraud" in a legal sense, because I am not a lawyer, but fraud in ordinary speech means deception; it means trickery; it means an imposture. It seems to me that the people who went to the polls last November in the State of Illinois were not under any misconception whatever about the facts or the character of the man whom they were asked to elect and whom they actually did elect. I do not think there was any corruption in so far as the electorate of the State of Illinois was concerned; at least, there is no allegation to that effect in the report of the committee. So far as we as Senators of the United States know, every vote that was cast at that election was cast in good faith and without any ulterior motive except the belief of the voters that Mr. SMITH should be elected as a Senator of the United States. The people knew the facts about Mr. SMITH. They went to the polls knowing them. The campaign had been waged on that particular issue and, after knowing all those facts, the people of Illinois deliberately went ahead and elected this man to represent the State of Illinois in this body.

Mr. President, there is another ground which is not specifically mentioned in the resolution, but which has been mentioned by nearly every Senator who has spoken against the seating of Mr. SMITH and which will come up in the sister case from Pennsylvania, which will be considered shortly. I am going to mention it briefly now. I refer to the excessive use of money in the primary campaign for Mr. SMITH. I wish to say that I agree with every word so eloquently uttered by the Senator from Nebraska a while ago as to the danger to the Republic from the excessive use of money in campaigns whether primary or general. I do not believe that such use of money necessarily means corruption, for I think large sums of money can be expended for what might be considered legitimate purposes. I do believe that in a republic it is an unfortunate thing to have a condition obtain where a poor man is under such an extreme handicap as against a wealthy opponent as can exist under the laws as they obtain to-day and as they did obtain in the State of Illinois.

I am against such a system; but I believe that the Senate of the United States, with its coequal branch at the other end of the Capitol, can regulate that matter. I believe that the Congress of the United States is a legislative body and not a debating society. It seems to me that it is up to the Senate, if they really believe what was stated by the Senator from Nebraska and what was so eloquently stated by the Senator from Missouri the other day, either to devise a Federal act which will control primaries in the different States, or else, if such an act should be decided to be unconstitutional, to pass and submit to the various States a constitutional amendment giving to the Congress of the United States the power to pass such an act. If we can not do that, we can at least adopt an amendment to the Senate rules stating exactly what we think are the qualifications for a man who comes to the door of this body. If we should adopt such a rule, we should then be in a position to speak about the candidate who comes here from the State of Illinois.

When I say that, Mr. President, I am aware that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] submitted an amendment to the Senate rules providing for just this sort of thing. He submitted it in June, 1926, and it was referred to the special committee of which the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is the chairman. It was referred to that committee on July 3, 1926. From that day to this no action whatever has been taken on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, I think the Senate should act according to due procedure. We have been referred to the resolution passed in the Newberry case, moved by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. What did that resolution state? It stated—I have not got it here, but I think I quote the language correctly—that such expenditures as had been made in the Michigan primaries were contrary to sound public policy——

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator will find the exact language repeated in the pending resolution.

Mr. CUTTING. I have that resolution before me:

> Contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government.

I agree with every statement made in that resolution, Mr. President; and I do think that the Senate might have followed it up in the course of seven years and tried to establish some Federal regulation for a condition which they considered of so much importance as is established in those words. As long as they did not, I think it is rather difficult for a man who aspires to the Senate in a State like Illinois or Pennsylvania to know exactly what he is bound to by the passage of the Willis resolution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that he at least has the Ten Commandments to guide him, and the common principles of honor and decency, without having his whole course through life charted by the Senate in advance.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, all I can say with regard to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri is that if he really feels that way about it he should submit the Ten Commandments as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No, Mr. President; I do not want to interrupt the Senator and I ought not to have said what I did; but some of us have an idea that the Ten Commandments and the Constitution can both stand at the same time.

Mr. CUTTING. I quite agree with the Senator, but the point I am trying to make is that if the Senate exacts certain qualifications of its Members it should also make those known to the people of the country. There have been seven years in which to clarify this matter, and all we have is the Willis resolution that $195,000 spent in the primaries of Michigan was too much money and affronted the dignity and honor of the Senate, and the rest of it, as I quoted a while ago.

What does that mean? What standard does it hold out to other States? What standard does it hold out to the State of Delaware, or the State of Rhode Island, or the State of Nevada, or the State of New York, or any of the other States? Are they all bound by this $195,000 rule? Is that too much for every State? Is it too much for any State? Is it ten times too much for any State, or is it just $5,000 too much for some particular State?

That is what I think the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives should have established before barring the door on some Senator who could not know what the Senate was going to do.

Mr. President, I am really anxious to know what Senators think. Mr. SMITH went into the primaries of Illinois knowing that his opponent was going to spend something like a million dollars in those primaries. Do you think the Willis resolution established a criterion which could guide him in his course? I will not ask Senators what they think Mr. SMITH should have done, because I think so little of Mr. SMITH that I would not ask any Senator on this side or the other side of the body to try to fathom his psychology; but I should like to find out what Senators think an honorable, decent, worthy aspirant for the office of Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois should have done under the conditions which existed after the passage of the Willis resolution, knowing that his opponent was going to spend about a million dollars.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARAWAY. By that question does the Senator mean to imply that SMITH was notified that the office was to be sold, and it was a question of how much he was willing to pay for it?

Mr. CUTTING. I did not imply anything of the sort.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then what does the Senator mean to say when he asks what SMITH should have done when he was aware of the fact, or suspected the fact, that his opponent was going to spend a million dollars? Did not that imply that the Senator meant to say that SMITH, knowing that a million dollars was going to be bid for this office, was at liberty to get out his pocketbook and go to his friend Insull and his friend Studebaker, who had the utilities, and ask them to put up the money to let him outbid the other candidate? Would not that necessarily follow?

Mr. CUTTING. No, Mr. President; that has nothing to do with the question that I raised. I am raising the question of a man of the highest principles, not a man sold to Insull, not a man sold to any traction magnate or anyone else in the country. I am raising the question of what a decent, respectable citizen of Illinois who aspired to the Senate of the United States should have done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, what does the Senator say he should have done?

Mr. CUTTING. I am going to vote against the pending resolution because I think the Willis resolution did not offer any criterion as to what should be done.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator was talking about a decent citizen.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. What should a decent man have done in Illinois at that time? The Senator asked the question. Now let him answer it.

Mr. CUTTING. No; I did not ask any question. I said, I am wondering what the Senators who are going to vote for this resolution think he should have done.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does the Senator from New Mexico think he should have done?

Mr. CUTTING. I think he might conscientiously have done exactly what Governor Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, did in his primary in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CARAWAY. Spend $187,000?

Mr. CUTTING. I think Governor Pinchot is a man whom no Senator in this body could accuse of corruption or impropriety or of acting against the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. CARAWAY. He should spend at least $187,000? Is that it?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I am not saying what I think should have been done.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator said he thought he ought to have done what the Governor of Pennsylvania did.

Mr. CUTTING. I think that under the Willis resolution it was a very difficult question for any candidate for the Senate to decide what he ought to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator says that under the Willis resolution it was difficult for a man who wanted to be a Senator to determine what he should do. The Willis resolution says that the expenditure of this amount of money, with or without the knowledge of the candidate, endangered free institutions and threatened the perpetuity of our Government. Now, what ought a good man to have done under those circumstances? He ought to have stopped short of that; ought he not?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I say a word?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think anybody here regards the Willis resolution as a criterion by which to be guided. We know the circumstances under which it was attached to that resolution, the purposes for which it was put in.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I know the purpose for which it was put in. It was for the purpose of letting somebody vote for Newberry who had to have some excuse.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Now, that being true, of course, we do not regard it as a rule of conduct at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. At least, I believe the Senator from Idaho will say that if a man believed that, he ought to stop this side of it if he wanted to be a Senator of the United States; ought he not? He ought not to do a thing which he thinks endangers the free institutions of his Government; ought he?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not; but $195,000 would be the grossest corruption in the State of Idaho. It would be the grossest corruption in the State of Nevada.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not what I was talking about. The question was, where ought a man to stop if he believed that resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I could imagine a man who believed that resolution under the circumstances——

Mr. CARAWAY. No; not under the circumstances.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I object to this debate in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from New Mexico——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico further yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUTTING. No; not on this point. I am nearly through discussing that.

I want to say that a man in the State of Illinois or any other State under the Willis resolution is in a very difficult position. It seems to me, to close that particular discussion, that a worthy, honorable, conscientious man who wanted to represent the State of Illinois in the Senate of the United States might easily have said, "My opponent is putting up this money. I can legitimately raise a similar sum of money, or half the sum of money, or some other sum of money, which I think will enable me to defeat my opponent. I have the Willis resolution to consider; and the Willis resolution, according to my conception of it, says that if a man spends these large sums of money and comes to the United States Senate he will be given a severe reprimand—and a seat in the Senate."

That is the only criterion that I can see from the Willis resolution unless it had been followed up, unless legislation had been passed by the Congress of the United States limiting expenditures in primaries and stating exactly what they believe, or, in the absence of that, passing an amendment to the Senate rules substantially equivalent to what was suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

That is my idea of the Willis resolution.

I agree with every word that was said by the Senator from Nebraska about the danger of the excessive expenditure of money in the United States in State elections and in national elections; and I feel that it is up to this body and the other branch of Congress to pass a resolution which will effectively curb such expenditures of money. Until such a resolution is passed, however, I submit that it is not fair to any individual to be brought up here before the bar of the Senate and told that that was too much money for him to spend.

I am not making a speech; I am making a statement of my belief, and if no other Senator with more experience or more ability in this body is willing to introduce a bill of that sort, I propose to do it myself; and if such a bill should be held unconstitutional, I propose that the Senate pass and send to the House a constitutional amendment to submit to the States which will effectively give Congress the power to control primary elections in the United States.

The public conscience has been awakened to such a point that I believe such a measure could be passed. I believe it ought to be passed, and if all the Senators who intend to vote for the unseating of Mr. SMITH will vote for such a constitutional amendment there will be no difficulty in putting it across, so far as this body is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator speaks of a constitutional amendment, I would like to call his attention to the fact that the Senate has passed one such amendment four different times in a little over six years. It has never been acted on by the House, although it is an amendment everybody favors. If it takes that long to get half way through an amendment everybody wants, how long will it take to get adopted an amendment to the Constitution to which a very large proportion of Senators here and Members of the House are opposed? It seems to me the Senator will find when he studies the matter a little further that he is undertaking practically an impossibility, because there are many people, even in this body, as the debate shows, who are opposed to limiting expenditures in any way, and the same is true of the House.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senate has at least seven years start of me. I think in that time a constitutional amendment could have been passed. I am not sure that the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case is conclusive as to this matter. I know they decided that the laws concerning primaries passed previous to that time were unconstitutional. I am not sure that they have decided that any Federal law governing the primary is necessarily unconstitutional. I think that thing should be tried out, and if it is tried out and found unsuccessful, then I believe in a constitutional amendment. I further believe that whether we pass a law or a constitutional amendment, the Senate might meanwhile adopt an amendment to its rules substantially equivalent to the one introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin a year and a half ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator, because he is a new Member, that when he goes to prepare his bill on corrupt practices and to prescribe the amount of money any one Senator may spend he will be aided if he goes back to the records of the Senate in the year 1916, when there was introduced a comprehensive measure upon that subject, prepared by a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the then Senator from the State of Iowa, Mr. Kenyon, and myself, the three of us having labored upon the matter for three weeks continuously. It was introduced, was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and has slept there ever since.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I think that sustains the point I am trying to make. I am not trying to criticize the Senate for having allowed a measure to sleep in committee all this time—Senators have had other things to do—but I do believe that we ought to use every effort to put through in legal form some measure governing the expenditure of money in primary elections; and there is no one whose advice on this subject I shall value more than that of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I have spoken a great deal longer than I intended, but I have been interrupted by a number of Senators, and I would like to get through with this as quickly as possible.

There has been a lot of talk about State rights, and I know that State rights are sometimes a stalking-horse for reaction; but I do believe that if there is one right that a State holds more sacred than any other, it is the right to select its own representatives in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. That is not an absolute right, or a final right. It is subject to the laws which the United States Congress passes. But I do submit that we have no right to say to any State, "Elect anyone you want, send him here, and then we will decide whether he is good enough to sit or not."

That is the theory which I am arguing against. The distinguished Senator from Missouri, who has done as much to awaken the public conscience as any man in this country, made the distinction the other day between the capacity to be elected and the propriety of being seated. Probably I am not able to grasp the subtlety of mind which prompted that distinction, but I do feel that if we are going to establish our right to veto the decision of the individual States of the Union we are not adopting a progressive policy but a thoroughly reactionary policy. It is a policy which was rejected by all the more progressive Greek states in the fifth and sixth centuries B. C. It is a theory that held its own in the Middle Ages, through the great Council of Venice, and other similar oligarchies. It has as its main exponents to-day the Fascist Party in Italy and the Communist Party in Russia. It is not an American doctrine.

I can understand some extreme nationalist urging such a theory, but I confess, Mr. President, I am surprised that Senators on the other side of the aisle, who have established their claim as the chief champions of State rights for the last 150 years, should adopt a doctrine of that sort.

Perhaps I should not be surprised, because I think the gentlemen who are opposing the seating of Mr. SMITH have something else in their minds. I believe they have in their minds that Mr. SMITH is an unworthy man to sit as a Senator of the United States. With that opinion I thoroughly agree. If I were a citizen of Illinois, I should spend every moment of my leisure in opposing the election of Mr. SMITH. But, Mr. President, I am not a citizen of Illinois. Eight hundred thousand of the voters of Illinois voted for Mr. SMITH. They knew all the facts about him, and I am very reluctant to vote to establish any doctrine which will impose on the Senate of the United States the duty of overriding the citizens of that State.

If we can establish the fact that we can judge of the moral fitness of a Senator designate, then we can judge of his physical or intellectual fitness. We can come here and hold an examination of a man in the lobbies of the Senate and say that he has to have vocal power sufficient to carry his words across the Senate Chamber, or aural powers sufficient to overcome the acoustic handicaps of this Chamber. We can say that he is not qualified to discuss details of a taxation or revenue bill, that he has not had the training, that he is not a university graduate, or any other test you may imagine. I do not say those things will follow. I do think, however, that the precedent we are establishing of throwing out a man because he is unfit, purely because he is unfit, is going to be a dangerous thing, and I think that is the main idea in the minds of men who are going to vote to unseat Mr. SMITH, that he is unfit to be a Member of the Senate. If it had not been so, I do not know how they could have voted to refuse him a seat when he was sent here by the Governor of the State of Illinois, without question of an election of any kind.

I believe it is a dangerous theory. I believe it is a theory which eventually, if this country ever comes to a condition where partisan or sectional feeling is as rampant as it was before the Civil War, will be repented not only by the Senate but by the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I am very reluctant to speak for the first time in this body in favor of seating a man whom I believe to be utterly unworthy in every respect to be a Member of the United States Senate. I do it because I value the deliberate decision of the voters of Illinois more than I do my individual opinion.

I want to suggest this thought; the fact that the voters of Illinois selected Mr. SMITH as their representative indicates a far more serious situation in this Republic than is indicated by the resolution submitted by the committee. If I believed, as has been stated on this floor, that a few men went into Illinois—Mr. Insull and a few other traction magnates—and bought up the electorate and bought the election, I would think it far less serious than what I believe took place, which was that the voters of Illinois deliberately went out and elected a man who had been corrupted by Mr. Insull and the traction magnates. But that is a symptom of a general condition in this country. It is a condition which we can not rectify by throwing out Mr. SMITH or Mr. VARE or any other individual. It means that the Government as left to us by the fathers has broken down, that it has to be cured by radical measures. It seems to me that the report of this committee, if I may say so with all due submission and due humility to the distinguished Senators who submitted it, and whose sincerity no man can question, is using a corn knife to perform what needs a major operation.

I think in the meantime we ought to abide by the orderly procedure, and by the principles and precedents which have been established in this body, which do not allow us to throw a man out simply on the question of his unfitness to hold the office. I admit our power. I do not admit our right.

I believe that by taking the action which there is no question the Senate is going to take to-day, we are going to make martyrs of two of the most unworthy candidates for martyrdom that ever existed in the United States. We are going to make martyrs of them individually, and we are going to make martyrs of the great States which they represent, I submit, with all due regard to the opinions of the very sincere and able and honorable Senators who have presented this report, that in turning down Mr. SMITH, elected by the voters of Illinois, we are committing a greater crime than Mr. SMITH did in accepting money from Mr. Insull, great though that crime was, because against one action there is no redress. I submit that there is no action in the world which could be more damaging to public policy, more harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, or more dangerous to the perpetuity of free government.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to put myself finally on record in this case, and that is the only reason why I shall now solicit for a few moments the attention of the Senate.

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] began his remarks by saying that he thought that a newcomer in this body might be allowed in his first speech to express an opinion upon a question of morals at least. But he has in some respects taken such an indulgent view of the offenses, criminal or otherwise, of FRANK L. SMITH that I am beginning to think that that should not be a rule of unvarying application in the Senate. However, it is only fair to the Senator to say that he did redeem himself to no small extent, in the eyes of those of us who differ from him, by frankly admitting that FRANK L. SMITH on the whole is unworthy of a seat in this body.

I shall not stop to ask whether this is so because of the great sum that was expended in his candidacy for nomination. So long as there is no Federal primary election law, what is or is not a proper sum to be spent in a contest for nomination to a seat in this body is a matter which will permit very considerable latitude of opinion. But I submit that no two upright or reasonable men can differ as to the gravity of the misconduct of SMITH in receiving, when he was the chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, large contributions toward his candidacy for nomination from the officers and directors of public-service corporations and from public-service corporations themselves. That would be true if there were no statutory provisions in the laws of the State of Illinois covering such a situation.

A man who is chairman of a public-service commission ought to have moral intuition, moral consciousness enough, entirely independent of any statute whatsoever, to tell him that it is a heinous thing for an individual charged with the duty of regulating the rates and administrative practices of public-service corporations to receive campaign contributions from such corporations or from their officers or directors.

Surely one who is capable of receiving such pecuniary aid when a candidate can not have even the bare rudiments of a public conscience. Nay, more, he can not have even a feeble sense of moral decency or propriety.

His own heart, the untutored promptings of his own moral nature, ought to tell him that there is something essentially, something indisputably wrong in a person to whom the supervision of the operations of great public-utility corporations is committed, accepting from their treasuries or from the purses of their officers or directors pecuniary aid for his campaign purposes. No man of honor could do such a thing. No man with any innate sense of right and wrong could do such a thing. It needs no constitution, it needs no statute, it needs no warning of the law in any form to tell him that he should not do that. The suggestions of his own breast should be the sole monitor required for his guidance.

But how much graver is the case when the statutory law of his State declares that it is a crime for him to do such a thing. The laws of the State of Illinois make it a criminal offense for anyone who is a director or officer of a public-service corporation to contribute to the expenses of a candidate for nomination, or for the candidate to receive such a contribution, and in addition to that they subject any candidate who receives such a contribution to the penalty of removal from the office which he has dishonored. So SMITH is not merely an individual indictable for a grave offense in the forum of conscience, or of sound morals, or of pure ethics. He is a violator of the criminal law of his State. He has transgressed a statute solemnly and deliberately framed for the purpose of safeguarding the public life of the State of Illinois from demoralization and corruption.

Pray, why has this man not been indicted? That is the real question which we should be asking here to-day. Is it because the people of the State of Illinois doubt their ability to bring him to justice, after having indicted and attempted to bring to justice the governor of that State upon a charge of embezzlement? It is true this governor escaped the meshes of the law to the extent of not being confined in the penitentiary of the State of Illinois, but we all remember that he was compelled to disgorge and restore to the treasury of the State of Illinois a sum of some $1,000,000. So, instead of coming here and asking for a seat in this body, SMITH, I say, should be defending himself in a court of justice upon charges set out against him in a formal criminal indictment.

Bear in mind, too, that SMITH is applying for a seat in this body at a time when a searching investigation into the Power Trust of this land is proposed. His pockets only recently stuffed with contributions made to his candidacy by the public-service corporations of the State of Illinois, including electric light and power companies, try to imagine with what measure of grace and energy he could apply himself to the task of helping to investigate the electric light and power companies of our country. The very idea arouses derision and disgust in the bosom of any scrupulous man. If he were seated, like the two Senators in the days of the Sugar Trust who were known as the "Senators from Havemyer," he might well be termed the "Senator from Insull."

No question is before us except the bare legal question as to whether we have the right when a Senator elect is morally unworthy to hold a seat in this body to shut him out from it. That is all.

Perhaps the ablest statement that has been made in behalf of SMITH by anyone is that made by that able lawyer and accomplished writer and speaker, JAMES M. BECK. He has perhaps given as close study to the issues of law involved in the pending controversy as anyone in the country. To what conclusion does he come?

The Senate, he contends, has no power even to expel SMITH for his misconduct, because the provisions in the Federal Constitution which empower two-thirds of the Senate to expel a Senator do not relate to any offenses except such as are committed after the Senator has taken his seat, and, moreover, not even to such offenses as those except so far as they have been committed by the Senator in the course of his senatorial duties. Nor, Mr. BECK contends, has the Senate any power to repel any Senator elect from its door because by the Federal Constitution it is given no power to do anything, in addition to expelling a Senator, except to pass upon the qualifications of a Senator, and by "qualifications" the Constitution means the senatorial qualifications alone specified in the Constitution; that is to say, those bearing upon age, citizenship, and inhabitancy.

The latter qualifications, Mr. BECK truly says, are not at issue in this case, and for the lack of any other qualifications the Senate he affirms has no power to exclude a Senator elect from this Chamber.

Rarely, I reply, have such purely artificial, such utterly unnatural trains of reasoning ever been pursued to establish any conclusion, because Mr. BECK's arguments lead to nothing less than the general conclusion that when such a man as SMITH applies for a seat in this body there is no political authority in the land endowed with vigor enough to deny him the seat—not the State from which he comes, because there is no pretense that any State official has the right to recall the certificate that is given to a Senator elect by the governor of his State. Nor yet the Senate itself, for the reasons that I have already mentioned, as assigned by Mr. BECK. So, I say, what Mr. BECK urges resolves itself finally into the claim that nowhere in the land—not in the States, not in the Federal Government, except to the extent of the limited qualifications as to age, citizenship, and residence specified in the Constitution, is there any power to withhold the senatorial oath of office, even from an embezzler, a thief, an incendiary, a rapist, or a murderer, or even from some poor wretch who has gone stark mad. Between the time that the Senator is elected and the time that he applies for his seat he may turn out a flagitious criminal or become non compos, but nowhere is there any power to deny him the seat. The whole argument is a reductio ad absurdum. Surely such a power of exclusion must reside somewhere. It is not to be believed for a moment that those great men who framed the Federal Constitution could have left such a case as the present one a mere casus omissus, a case for which no legal provision is made at all. Such a flagrant oversight is certainly not to be lightly assumed.

Think of it! FRANK L. SMITH or some other unconceivable fellow might come here and apply for a seat and might by chance be given a seat next to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], we will say, or the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], or me, and notwithstanding the fact that his very breath was pollution to any one of the three, there would be no power in the States, there would be no power in the Senate to expel him, to say nothing about its lack of power in the first instance to withhold the oath of office from him. There are some arguments that destroy themselves, that have the seeds of their own dissolution in them; that ex necessitate rei—from the very necessity of the case—must be fallacious and false through and through, and such an argument, I say with great respect, is that of Mr. BECK, who is about the best foot that SMITH has put foremost.

This body, I claim, has the power to exclude SMITH from its membership. That power is found in the provisions of the Constitution that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members.

The only reason why that is doubted is because for a long time, of course, the political thought of this country was almost slavishly shaped by the extreme dogmas of State rights. If there had not been that long struggle in this country between State sovereignty and Federal sovereignty, I venture to say that no lawyer would hesitate to declare that the word "qualifications" in the Constitution is broad enough to give the Senate the power either to exclude or to expel a Senator for any form of moral turpitude.

I am the last person in the world to say a word derogatory to real State rights; nobody in this body is in the habit of drawing the line between the rights of the States and the rights of the Federal Government more jealously than I; but just as I do not believe in the Federal Government encroaching upon the rights and powers of the States, so do I religiously believe in the States not encroaching upon the rights and powers of the Federal Government. It was the intent of the framers of the Constitution that each government should move, without jar or friction, in its own sphere. Considering the question entirely independent of traditional and fixed habits of thought in relation to State rights in the past, I fail to find in the Federal Constitution any provision indicating a jealous regard for State rights in relation to questions as to the qualifications of Members of this body.

The tenderness of the Federal Constitution in connection with the elections, returns, and qualifications of Senators is not for the States. Where can there be found in it a word supporting such an idea? The tenderness of all the provisions of the Federal Constitution which relate to those subjects is for Federal sovereignty and power.

It is true that the Constitution prescribes that the times, manner, and places of election shall be prescribed by the State legislatures, but the Constitution is careful to add subject to such regulations as Congress may prescribe except as to the places of selecting Senators. Then it says:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

It is true that the tenth amendment to the Constitution declares:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

But my point is that the right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of Members of either House is a right delegated by the Federal Constitution in express terms to the two Houses of the Federal Legislature. There is not a word in the Federal Constitution which sanctions the idea that the States when the Constitution was framed reserved the right to pass upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of Members of either House. If there is any such reservation, will not some Member of the Senate be so kind as to point it out to me?

There is not one. The Constitution does not say either expressly or by implication that when a Senator elect arrives here the State from which he comes is to have a voice with reference to his election, or the returns of his election, or his qualifications. It does not say either expressly or by implication that the State shall have the right to revoke his credentials. In other words, not one solitary word of reservation by which the State can claim to retain any power over a Senator elect is to be found in the language of the Federal Constitution. So it must follow by irresistible inference, it seems to me, that the power to pass upon the qualifications of Senators is one lodged by the Federal Constitution in the Federal Government alone as represented by the two Houses of Congress, and lodged there by the provision that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members.

The question, of course, has never been passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States. We would not be arguing here if it had been; but I venture to say that whenever the import of the word "qualification" comes up in the Supreme Court of the United States that court will hold that the word is broad enough to confer on this body the power to shut out any Senator elect whatsoever who is believed by it, for good and sufficient reasons, to be morally unfit for the office of Senator.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Can the Senator suggest any way by which that question could be brought to the Supreme Court? I confess I myself have difficulty in thinking of any.

Mr. BRUCE. I have given no thought to that aspect of the case. I am not prepared to say now just how as a matter of procedure the question could be brought before the court. I read a few days ago in the press that an effort was going to be made to take the question to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLEASE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the inquiry made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and have been for some time past. I do not know whether the view is tenable, but it has occurred to me that it might be dealt with in this manner:

If Mr. SMITH should be rejected and the Governor of Illinois should regard the situation as creating a vacancy and should take steps to fill it either by a temporary appointment or by calling a special election for that purpose and Mr. SMITH should apply to the Supreme Court of Illinois for a writ of prohibition to restrain the governor from taking that step it has occurred to me that, perhaps, a writ of certiorari could be secured from the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that a Federal question was involved in that the Senate had no power to reject him and that the action of the Senate did involve a Federal question which might give the Supreme Court jurisdiction to grant a writ of certiorari.

As I have said, the question which the Senator from Pennsylvania has raised has interested me for a long time, and I should like to have his views as well as those of the Senator from Maryland on the suggestion I have just made.

Mr. BRUCE. I think that that suggestion is hardly germane to the line of discussion that I was pursuing, and I must say that I do not relish those words "writ of prohibition." [Laughter.]

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, having regard for the well-known views of the Senator from Maryland, I will change the expression and say "writ of inhibition." I inquire of the Senator from Maryland if that term suits him better?

Mr. BRUCE. The word still contains three bad syllables.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will pardon me further, I really wanted to get the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to whether he thinks that procedure is tenable.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will forgive us for interjecting this into the middle of his argument——

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; of course, I will.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It was suggested by something he said about the Supreme Court passing ultimately, or some day, on the interpretation of this word "qualifications."

Mr. BRUCE. That was entirely contingent, of course.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have thought of the possibility of getting the question into the Supreme Court by Mr. SMITH asserting in his State courts that there was no vacancy, and trying to prevent, by writ of some sort, the holding of an election to fill that vacancy or the making of an appointment; but I am afraid that the trouble will be not that the question can not be taken to the Supreme Court, but that when it gets there the Supreme Court will say that it is a question of the internal government of the Senate, and that it will not undertake to review the determination which the Senate itself makes regarding the membership of one of its individuals. In other words, it would present the same legal question as if by some method we took to the Supreme Court a decision that we made on an election contest for a seat in this Chamber. The Supreme Court undoubtedly would decline to review the action of the Senate in such a contest.

Mr. BRUCE. Or in relation to any question political in its nature.

Mr. BRATTON. Undoubtedly that would be true, Mr. President; and, of course, if the Supreme Court of the United States should take the view just outlined by the Senator from Pennsylvania—that our determination here is conclusive and is binding upon a coordinate branch of the Government—that would foreclose any possibility of ever having the constitutional provision in question construed.

The point I have in mind, however, is one of procedure. Could the procedure that I have outlined be pursued in bringing the matter before the Supreme Court and ascertaining whether it will review the case and interpret the constitutional provision?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the procedure will bring the question to the court, but I do not believe the court will go behind the decision of the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. If not, then we are powerless to get what I should like very much to have, and that is an interpretation by the Supreme Court of the power of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Why should this body want an interpretation of the Supreme Court as to the discharge of a function which is peculiarly delegated to this body? I think it is highly important that the Senate retain for itself at all times the power to determine the qualification of the Members who sit here; and if I thought the Supreme Court could ever pass upon it I would be in favor of amending the Constitution so that they could not.

Mr. BRATTON. I feel rather to the contrary. We are not in accord as to whether we have the power; and, so far as I am concerned, I should like very much to have an expression from the Supreme Court of the United States, and I should be strongly persuaded by an opinion from that court. It might not be controlling; it might not be compelling, but in my judgment it would be persuasive.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me——

Mr. BRUCE. I will; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a suggestion on this proposition. It seems to me, I will say to the Senator, that there is not any doubt in this body. Even the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who suggests a way by which this matter might possibly be brought to the Supreme Court, says that in his judgment when it got to the Supreme Court the Supreme Court would promptly say that they had nothing to do with it. That would really be passing on it by the Supreme Court, would it not?

I only wanted to call attention to the fact that probably there is no serious doubt in the mind of any Senator but that the Supreme Court would not touch it, but would say, "The Senate's judgment can not be reviewed; and they are supreme."

Mr. BRATTON. Of course, Mr. President, what I should like to have is a decision from the Supreme Court of the United States as to what the phraseology, "judge of the qualifications of its own Members" means; whether we are confined to age, residence, and being an inhabitant of the State, or whether we can go beyond that and consider other facts.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I simply want to interject this remark at this time, because I should not like the RECORD to stand that two or three Senators had expressed a desire for a Supreme Court decision, but only one Senator expressed a feeling in opposition.

I agree absolutely with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I do not think this is a question that ever ought to go to any court. This is a question for this body to decide. I never would consent to turn over to the Supreme Court of the United States, however highly I regard that body, the right to determine the jurisdiction of the Senate over a question vital to its existence.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, there is nothing anomalous about a question of a political or quasi-political nature not being appealable to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The point I was making is that apart from what might be called nowadays the outworn or obsolete side of State rights, there would not be any real difficulty in determining what the meaning of this word "qualifications" is.

Surely if it had been the intent of the framers to limit the word "qualifications" to the qualifications as to age, citizenship, and inhabitancy prescribed by the Constitution, the provision of the Constitution relating to the elections, returns, and qualifications of Members would read—

Elections, returns, and qualifications as hereinbefore prescribed.

So far as I know, that point does not happen to have been made by anybody else in this debate; but, of course, it is suggested by a course of reasoning that is very frequently pursued by a court under similar circumstances. Would the framers of the Constitution have contented themselves simply with the abstract term "qualifications" if they had intended to give to that word any such restricted scope as is contended for? Would they not have added, as I have suggested, after the word "qualifications," the words "as hereinbefore prescribed"?

Another thing we must recollect—that at the time this word "qualifications" was employed by the framers of the Constitution they had before them the history of the British Parliament and the well-settled boundaries of the powers of Parliament; and it was perfectly natural, therefore, that they should have intended to give to each House of Congress in dealing with the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members powers at least as great as those with which the British Parliament was clothed?

Of course, the construction for which I contend might lead to abuse. The Senate might undertake, on some more or less frivolous pretext or other, to shut out from this body a Senator elect; but if the Senate did it, it would be subject to its just responsibility to the people.

The people have enough good judgment, enough sense, and enough discrimination to know in what case it would be reasonable for the Senate to exclude a Member elect and in what case it would not be reasonable. But, of course, I hardly need point out the fact that there are many powers of one sort or another vested in the Federal Government or the State governments that are readily susceptible of abuse.

Did it ever occur to the Members of the Senate—I believe the fact was pointed out by Justice Cooley a great many years ago—that the States at any moment might bring the entire Federal Government to an end by doing what they are not forbidden to do anywhere in the Federal Constitution; that is to say, by declining to send Representatives to the House of Representatives and Senators to the Senate of the United States? Every power that is lodged in a government presupposes a certain amount of sanity and sense of duty on the part of that government.

Now, just one or two random thoughts in conclusion, and I am done.

I attach very little importance to the precedents that have been brought forward here—precedents derived from the decisions of this body and of the House of Representatives. We know that those precedents are very largely the mere offspring of moments of partisan excitement, or of selfish intrigue. You can without any difficulty, in connection with the question which is now under consideration, find conclusions diametrically opposed to each other which have been reached by the two Houses. I ascribe no conclusive importance either to the idea that when the voters have chosen to elect somebody under fire, that man is always completely purged of all his offenses of every sort, no matter how deep their dye.

When I was opposing an old political ring a great many years ago, that idea used to be constantly made to do service. Some scamp would be nominated for office, or would be elected to office, and then the cry would be raised, "He has been vindicated!" No matter how grave had been the indictment against him, no matter how completely his unfitness for high office had been demonstrated, just as soon as a majority of the voters, acting often under mere boss or machine influence, had nominated or elected him, the cry would go up that though his sins had been as scarlet, they had been made as white as wool.

There is nothing final about the fact that SMITH was elected by the people. Even the people are not infrequently misled from one cause or another. As the old English poet says, "The worst of tyrants is the usurping crowd"; and the statement is not altogether destitute of truth. The old proverb says, "It is much easier to drive a flock of sheep than a single member of the flock"; and everybody who knows the astonishing subserviency that voters at times in hours of fierce partisanship exhibit in their relations to political leadership know that SMITH is not necessarily rendered anything different from what he truly is by the fact that a majority of the voters in the State of Illinois elected him to a seat in this body.

It is a lamentable thing that our institutions should work that way at times; but they do work that way at times, and we all know it; though in the long reckoning I fully subscribe to the true Democratic or Republican idea that the people are the best judges of what appertains to their own honor and safety.

That, I believe, concludes everything I have to say with regard to this subject. I am sorry to have trespassed on the patience of the Senate so long. I have spoken in a much more extended way than I expected, and I am glad now to yield the floor to other Senators.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, on December 7 the Senate voted on the Norris resolution, the second paragraph of which read as follows:

Be it further resolved, That the claim of the said FRANK L. SMITH to a seat in the United States Senate is hereby referred to the said special committee of the Senate, with instructions to grant such further hearing to the said FRANK L. SMITH, and to take such further evidence on its own motion, as shall be proper in the premises, and to report to the Senate at the earliest possible day; that until the coming in of the report of said committee, and until the final action of the Senate thereon, the said FRANK L. SMITH be, and he is hereby, denied a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I voted against that resolution for this reason: In Article V of the Constitution it is specifically stated:

No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

That is not one of the rights of the States which the States may claim by virtue of having reserved all those rights not delegated to the Federal Government, but it is one in which the States themselves have specifically not only reserved the right to refuse to be deprived of equal representation, but that special clause seems to me to be one different from any provided in the Constitution. For instance, it is not necessary for all of the States to agree to amend the Constitution in order to make an amendment valid, but this special provision and this special reservation made by the States themselves makes it impossible to amend that particular section or clause of the Constitution. In other words, if all but one of the States of the Union agree to increase the representation of each State to three, or to four, or to reduce it to one, any one State might object to it, and that objection, under the pact between the States, would be, I think, a valid one, and one recognized to be within the strict rights reserved by the States.

When I voted against that resolution it was known as the Norris resolution. I voted for the Deneen substitute, which provided:

Resolved, That without expressing any opinion as to the right or propriety of his retaining his seat in advance of any proper investigation thereof the said FRANK L. SMITH is entitled to be sworn in as a Member of this Senate upon his prima facie case.

That to me, Mr. President, was the only course which I believed I could follow, in view of my construction of the Constitution that we may not deprive a State of equal representation. To have voted for the Norris resolution, and to have made Mr. SMITH stand aside while important measures were being discussed here, was not a matter which affected me, so far as Mr. SMITH personally was concerned, but I believed that the State of Illinois should have an equal voice on this floor.

Now comes the report of the committee, which we are called upon to vote on, and I find this language in the second paragraph of the resolution:

That the said FRANK L. SMITH is not entitled to take the oath of office and is not entitled to membership in the Senate of the United States, and that a vacancy exists in the representation of the State of Illinois in the United States Senate.

It appears to me that that portion of the resolution offered by the committee now pending—"is not entitled to take the oath of office and"—and about to be voted on, is superfluous, in that if Mr. SMITH is not entitled to his seat—and we have already determined that he was not entitled to be sworn in, with which I disagreed, but the Senate voted that way—that point has been settled. So that if his seat is to be declared vacant there is no reason to say he is not entitled to be sworn. If the seat is vacant no one is entitled to claim it.

At the time I voted Mr. SMITH was present and ready to take the oath. I voted to permit him to take the oath and then to expedite the consideration of his case in order to permit Illinois to have representation here and then to dispose of the case on its merits.

Now, we are presented with two phases of the matter. The one which we have already acted upon is reiterated in this resolution, and then the merits of the case are brought up. I feel this way about that, and I know that several who voted the way I did previously on this matter feel the same way, that there is no reason to ask anyone who is willing on the merits to vote for this resolution to stultify himself on the principle which caused himself to disagree from a majority of the Chamber previously and which is not necessary in this instance.

If we declare the seat vacant, neither Mr. SMITH nor anyone else is entitled to claim it, and he is not here now claiming the right to be sworn in. So that I would ask the chairman of the committee if he will not agree to amend the resolution so that those who wish to vote with him on the merits of the case may do so without reference to a previous vote on another question, which, to my mind, should not be brought to the Senate at this time.

I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he will not modify the resolution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Has the Senator concluded his remarks?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to modify the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to call a quorum?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will if the Senator thinks a quorum is necessary for this particular matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator was about to suggest a change in the resolution, and I thought a quorum ought to be called.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well; the Senator has that right, of course.

Mr. BINGHAM. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I have heard the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] that he would like to have stricken from the second resolve the words "is not entitled to take the oath of office and," so that the resolution would read:

That the said FRANK L. SMITH is not entitled to membership in the Senate of the United States, and that a vacancy exists in the representation of the State of Illinois in the United States Senate.

The fact is that those words are surplusage; the Senate has already refused to administer the oath, and we are now about to vote on the question as to whether Mr. SMITH is entitled to membership. I think I pretty well know that we are going to vote that he is not entitled to membership; at least, I have an impression of that kind.

There are a number of Senators who feel that with these particular words to which I have called attention in the resolution, if they voted for it they would be voting opposite to the vote they cast heretofore. I do not think so, but they do, and I am willing to amend the resolution by taking out the words "is not entitled to take the oath of office and," but in doing so I want it distinctly understood that, so far as I am concerned, and I think so far as the vast majority of the Senate are concerned, we do not regard the withdrawal of these words as in any manner withdrawing the position heretofore taken, that the Senate was right in refusing to administer the oath under the circumstances existing in this case.

I think my colleague, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has been rendering very valuable service on the committee, perhaps will desire to say in his own behalf what his views are about taking out these words. I yield to him for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri can modify the resolution, if he so desires, without proposing it as an amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am proposing, as one of the sponsors for the resolution, to withdraw those words.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is in charge of the resolution and I shall interpose no objection to his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be considered as modified.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, if there is any other Member of the Senate who desires to say anything, I request that he take the floor at this time; otherwise I would like to have the privilege of closing the argument, and I think I shall be very brief.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I offer as a substitute for the pending resolution. I wish to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed substitute.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas FRANK L. SMITH, claiming to be a Senator from the State of Illinois, has presented his credentials, which are regular and in due form, and there being no contestant for the seat; and

Whereas on January 7, 1928, said FRANK L. SMITH appeared before the special committee of the Senate, appointed on May 17, 1926, and stated that before he would enter into any defense upon any charges or objections which have or may be presented against his right to a seat in the United States Senate he would insist upon his constitutional right to membership in this body by taking the oath of office, and that after having taken the oath of office he would be pleased to appear before any committee of the Senate and "freely, gladly, and unafraid meet any and all charges respecting my moral or other fitness to become a Member of this distinguished body": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the oath of office be administered to said FRANK L. SMITH; be it further

Resolved, That his credentials and all charges which may be filed, or have been filed against him, and all objections that may be raised or have been raised as to his right to a seat in the Senate, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that committee is hereby directed to hear and determine all such charges and objections which may be submitted, and to report to the Senate after due inquiry and as early as convenient.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy much additional time, having already spoken on three different occasions and expressed my views in the case.

FRANK L. SMITH contends that he has had no opportunity to defend himself. I wish to read from the speech made by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] two brief paragraphs in support of my views. The speech was delivered in this Chamber on December 7 last, and on this point the senior Senator from Idaho said:

It has been said that Mr. SMITH has been before the committee. He went before the committee as a witness. He went before the committee at a time when he did not hold the certificate of his State. He was there a citizen. But there is no place in the committee room or elsewhere where he as a witness is placed upon an equality with those who challenge his right to a seat, which equality he has when he comes here and takes his oath and speaks by authority of the State of Illinois. Does anybody who holds a seat in this Chamber contend that the rights and privileges and influence of a witness are to be compared with the privileges and powers of a Senator speaking as a matter of right for a sovereign State?

It is a high and honorable ambition to seek a seat in this body and to see that ambition thwarted upon the threshold of its realization, whatever may be the reason, stirs the deeper feelings of the human heart. If his discussion of his view of the matter modifies our view, he is entitled to that benefit and his State is entitled to it. If he fails to modify our view, we have recognized and tolerated to the fullest extent the right of a State to be heard, and there will be no regrets upon our part when we shall have acted. All will have had the fullest opportunity to be heard, one of the best assurances that full justice will be done.

Senator-elect SMITH has had no opportunity to defend himself, as one charged with an offense should have. He has appeared as a witness in a matter comparable to a grand jury inquest. He is entitled to be heard.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my recollection is that the Senator from Missouri modified his resolution before the Senate passed it, giving Mr. SMITH the right to come in here and defend his title.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Of course, the resolution which has just been offered is out of order, because the Senate has at this session voted on exactly that question.

Mr. DENEEN. It is a different resolution. Certain paragraphs are similar to a former resolution, but the question itself relates to SMITH's right of self-defense, which was not embodied in the previous resolution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not care anything about making the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Illinois is in order as an amendment to the pending resolution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the question has been voted on at this session of the Senate. What I have to say can as well be said now as at any other time, and I shall proceed unless some other Senator indicates a desire to speak. I am going to try to be very brief.

Mr. President, nothing has brought more shame on the administration of justice than the employment of technical quibbles to defeat the plain intendment of the law. There has been presented here on behalf of Mr. SMITH no argument based upon the justice and merits of his case.

No Senator has dared assert that his conduct in seeking the election is free from grave reproach.

No Senator has dared defend the payment, in the form of a campaign contribution, of nearly a quarter of a million dollars by the proprietor of great public-service corporations to the chief officer of a semijudicial board which held the power of life and death over the interests represented by the contributor.

No Senator has dared defend the acts of the president of that great public board in accepting nearly a quarter of a million dollars from litigants constantly before his court and depending for their very existence upon the decisions by him rendered.

No Senator has dared claim that the amount of money expended on behalf of FRANK L. SMITH was not so excessive as to be clearly unjustifiable.

No Senator asserts—none dare assert—that FRANK L. SMITH comes here with clean hands.

No Senator asserts that FRANK L. SMITH did not arrive here over a crooked and dishonorable path.

Neither did SMITH himself, when given the fullest opportunity to make his defense and present his card, offer a single word of evidence or argument to explain, palliate, or excuse his course of conduct. On the contrary, Mr. SMITH and his defenders throw up a smoke screen of legal technicalities, sophistries, and refinements which, if entertained, will sanctify the fraud of the present and open wide the door to every trickster, bribe giver, ballot-box stuffer, and corruptionist who may in the future come here with a certificate, howsoever obtained.

According to their theory, if the corrupt governor of a State were to publicly announce that he proposed to sell at auction the right to a seat in the Senate to fill a vacancy, and if the sale were publicly held and the office knocked down to the highest bidder, and the purchaser should come here with his corrupt certificate thus corruptly obtained, and although the facts were officially made known to the Senate and although the applicant admitted them openly and blatantly upon the floor of the Senate, still the Senate would be obliged to seat the applying criminal, and, according to the theory of SMITH and his advocates, the Senate would be powerless to remove him from the position he dishonored. There he could sit and continue to vote away the money and, perchance, the honor and life of the United States of America.

There is, in fact, no difference in law between the right of the Senate to refuse to admit or remove a man coming with the credentials of a governor to fill a vacancy and the right to remove a man coming with credentials of a governor certifying to an election.

But the argument is made that if a candidate has been guilty of illegal, immoral, or villainous conduct, and that conduct has been discussed and yet he nevertheless receives a majority of the votes, even though his corrupt practices may have been the very thing that enabled him to obtain that majority, the Senate is thereby barred from action; the fraud has become consummate and sanctified, and all relief is impossible.

Obviously if the Senate has the right to inquire into the corrupt practices by which the certificate of a governor is obtained in the case of an appointment, it has equally the right to inquire into the corrupt practices by which a majority vote is obtained. A majority, sirs, can not sanctify fraud; it can not make black white; it can not transform evil into good; it can not change dishonesty into honesty. The cloak of a majority vote no more purges villainy of its iniquity than a coat of whitewash can transmute a sepulchre filled with the bones of dead men into a palace of pleasure. The law and the principles of equity disregard every sham. The hand of justice tears aside the cloak of pretense, and her sword, cutting through artifice, fraud, chicanery, and sophistry, cleaves to the very marrow of the case

Yet we have listened here to arguments—most of them legal arguments—as baseless as the vagaries of an opium dream; arguments that start nowhere in the law or Constitution and that end nowhere except in vaporings that are without sense or reason.

Senators stand here and tell me that the Senate has no jurisdiction to pass upon the qualifications of a man or the character of his election when it is written into the Constitution itself that the Congress may take complete charge of every election to the Senate. Congress is limited in only one respect; it can not fix the place of the election of a Senator; and that is now obsolete since the election takes place in the State at large by the people.

Not only has Congress the right to judge of the qualifications but within the limits of the Constitution we find the right to lay down the entire method of election. In the same section we find this:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

In the next section we find this language:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members.

In those two clauses is the complete, final, and absolute control. No language that man could pen and no decision that courts could render would make that language plainer, even if we should use all the words of our vocabulary.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Does that include primary elections?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly; it would include primary elections.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then, the Senator proposes to overrule the Supreme Court.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Of course the Senator wants to reargue the case.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The majority of the Supreme Court did hold in the Newberry case that our then existing law did not affect that case, but I have not the slightest doubt that the Senate has the power to prescribe every step by which an election shall be held, if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Missouri recall a case that has been handed down since the Newberry case?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not.

Mr. CARAWAY. The court in that case held that the primary was a substantial part of the election and that the denial to a negro of the right to vote in the primary was in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, we have listened to a most singular logic here and have listened to it for days; a logic that reverses every principle of argument. Certain Senators begin by assuming the very question to be proven, and from that position are, of course, able to reach a conclusion which is quite satisfactory to themselves. Here is their formula, I have written it down: "SMITH is the duly elected Senator from Illinois; therefore, the Senate may not inquire into his election or qualifications."

Again: "Illinois duly elected SMITH to represent that State in the Senate; therefore, the Senate has no right to oust him, for it thereby deprives Illinois of equal representation in the Senate."

These Senators may proudly imagine that they originated that kind of logic, but it was long ago discovered by some other person. The question being why did the cow cross the road, a logician of that period answered: "Our old cow, she crossed the road because she crossed the road, and the reason why she crossed the road was because she crossed the road."

So the question being, Was SMITH duly elected? these Senators say, "SMITH was duly elected because he was duly elected, and the reason why he was duly elected is because he was duly elected, and you have not any right to touch him."

Mr. President, let me see if I am going too far astray in thus characterizing these arguments. Each assumes the whole question in dispute, for, of course, if SMITH was duly elected he is entitled to his seat. Of course, again, to be duly elected means that one was chosen according to law, and one chosen according to law must possess the legal qualification, and must in securing his election have conformed with the mandates of the law. As the law condemns bribery, fraud, and other iniquitous practices, when it is said that one has been duly elected it is in fact asserted that he has every qualification and that his election is without taint of wrong. None save an imbecile would assert that the Senate could justly reject a man so chosen. But the question is, not whether one duly chosen within the meaning of the law shall be denied a seat; the question is, Was SMITH duly chosen? If so, then he must be seated. If not, then he is a mere interloper and seating him is a crime against the Federal Government and a crime against the State of Illinois.

Again, if SMITH was, within the meaning of the law, duly chosen by Illinois, it is entitled to have him seated because he justly and properly represents the State.

Contrariwise, if SMITH was not within the meaning of the law duly chosen, then the seating of him is a gross wrong done to the State of Illinois. It is in fact a double wrong, for we not only seat an interloper to misrepresent the State, but we bar the State from obtaining proper representation. We place a burglar in possession of the house and give him the key that he may lock the door against the return of the absent owner. Clearly, therefore, it is our high duty not only to the United States but as well to the State of Illinois to determine whether SMITH was in fact duly chosen within the meaning of the law as I have defined it.

At this point we are met with the assertion that the certificate of the governor is binding and conclusive and can not be inquired into by the Senate or by any other earthly tribunal. If that be the correct doctrine, then the governor of a State, by a false certificate, can nullify two distinct provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Indeed, in conceivable cases, one or two State governors could by false certificate change the political balance in the Senate and alter the policy of the Nation. Such a governor might appoint a subject of a foreign power, a nonresident of the State, or one under age, or, as I have stated, sell the appointment for cash in hand, and the Nation would be powerless to prevent the wrong.

Although some have broadly asserted this monstrous doctrine, including, I think I am fair in saying, Mr. SMITH himself when he appeared before the committee, with most it sticks in the throat, and they therefore try to bite the thing in two and swallow it piecemeal. Accordingly they say that the Senate may inquire into citizenship, age, and residence. But that admits the right to go behind the certificate and destroys the doctrine that the recitations of the certificate are final and binding. It necessarily concedes the power of the Senate, as to certain questions, to inquire into the facts non obstante the return.

Where do these logicians find the authority of the Senate so to inquire?

If they assert it to be an inherent power, then that inherent power springs from the right of a body to exclude all who are not entitled to sit; and that power must include all disqualifications, whether arising from age or fraud, from citizenship or corruption, from residence or bribery.

If, however, they search the Constitution for authority so to inquire, they find the language gives exactly the same right to inquire into fraud in elections as to inquire into constitutional disqualifications.

Congress is the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members.

Here, then, is the right to determine whether there was an election—that is to say, whether there was an election holden according to law; that is to say, whether the election was honestly conducted. Any other kind of an election is no election at all. It is a sham, a pretense, an unseemly fraud. It is a crime against society and the Nation; and no certificate of a governor can transmute a crime into a good title to office.

Mr. President, a clamor was raised that this man was entitled to defend himself upon the floor of the Senate. A claim was put forward that he had not stated his case or been permitted to state his case. Accordingly the Senate rereferred the matter to the committee; and this man who had clamored that he had not been heard, and that there might be other evidence to adduce, came before the committee, and what was his position?

First, he asked for delay that he might prepare himself to be heard. When he came there he said that he could not defend his moral fitness for the Senate, because by defending his moral fitness for the Senate he would be waiving the sovereign right of Illinois to have him seated, no matter whether he was morally fit or unfit.

How would he have waived it? If the State of Illinois had the right, sir, to have him seated in this body, no act of the man could waive the right of the State of Illinois. His right would have been as unimpaired after he had presented evidence as to his moral fitness as it would have been before he presented it. The fact is that after many days of careful thought as to some means by which he could escape the ordeal of attempting a justification, somebody said, "File a plea to the jurisdiction of the committee and the Senate, and stand on your constitutional rights," and that is what Mr. SMITH did.

So that we have here a case that stands out all by itself, distinguishable from every other case that has ever been before this body of the House. Ordinarily the man comes presenting his certificate; it is accepted for its face value; he is sworn in, because there is nothing there to dispute or destroy the certificate. That action, however, is not compulsory. The House and the Senate in every instance have the right to inquire on their own motion, regardless of any certificate. However, in practice they have accepted the certificate; and I have insisted upon that course when there was nothing to dispute the truth of the certificate.

In this case, however—it has been told many times; I am simply putting it in as part of my remarks so that they will be more or less complete—the Senate made its investigation and had the facts before it at the time the certificate was filed, and those facts are the facts that you to-day have before you—not an additional fact—and the Senators who say they are willing to exclude a man upon those facts, but they want him sworn in first, simply say that his certificate is worthless and his title is void even after he has been sworn in.

How a Senator can take that position, and say that he wants a man seated with all the evidence before him that he is ever going to have, and then he is going to unseat him as soon as he has seated him, is just a little beyond my power of understanding.

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate much further. One strange argument that I heard here to-day came from the junior Senator from New Mexico. It seemed to be this: SMITH's conduct was awful; and the "awfuller" it was the "awfuller" it is not to seat him. That seemed to be the substance of that argument.

This I have to say, and I say it with apology for taking your time even to make the comment:

We are not called upon to act in a doubtful case. We are not called upon to weigh disputed facts. We have the cold proposition that the proprietor of great public-service corporations contributed nearly a quarter of a million dollars, and I think the evidence warrants me in saying not of his own money but the money of the corporations, for it was taken out of the tills of the corporations and it was never put back until the storm broke in the Senate. That money is given to the judge of the court—for that is what the board really is—to the judge of the court who has been passing upon the business and the controversies of the companies. Why was it given? No reason has been assigned, except that this gentleman wanted to give it. Why did he want to give it? He did not tell us there was some particular reason, that there was love and friendship for SMITH, that he was interested in certain great principles, or anything of that kind. He gave it to SMITH; and I am warranted in saying he gave it to SMITH because SMITH held this important position.

So the question is this: Can great institutions contribute enormous sums of money to the judges of courts, or to the members of tribunals possessing quasi-judicial power and a discretionary power greater than any court possesses; can they with their money aid these their judges into higher positions, and elect them to this body, where they will still continue to represent those who have put up the money to send them here?

We need go into no refinements. It is a plain, bald, naked question we are going to settle; that is, whether seats can be bought in the United States Senate in the interest of those who have had the right to decide as to the life and death of the interests contributing the money.

We do not need to pass any rule of conduct. There are certain things so plain that you need the guideboard of no law to tell you they are evil. If this man is to be seated, let us hang over the door of the Senate: "Seats for sale." If he is not to be seated, let us by our acts put over the door of the Senate this thought: "Here, at least, is one place where money can not buy an office of power."

Mr. President, I am ready to vote upon this question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was absent for a moment. I should like to have read the original resolution—not the whereases; just the resolving part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the original resolution as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the acceptance and expenditure of the various sums of money aforesaid in behalf of the candidacy of the said FRANK L. SMITH is contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and taints with fraud and corruption the credentials for a seat in the Senate presented by the said FRANK L. SMITH; and be it further

Resolved, That the said FRANK L. SMITH is not entitled to membership in the Senate of the United States, and that a vacancy exists in the representation of the State of Illinois in the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute resolution of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN].

Mr. HEFLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, may the substitute resolution be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the substitute resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas FRANK L. SMITH, claiming to be a Senator from the State of Illinois, has presented his credentials, which are regular and in due form, and there being no contestant for the seat; and

Whereas on January 7, 1928, said FRANK L. SMITH appeared before the special committee of the Senate appointed on May 17, 1926, and stated that before he would enter into any defense upon any charges or objections which have or may be presented against his right to a seat in the United States Senate, he would insist upon his constitutional right to membership in this body by taking the oath of office, and that after having taken the oath of office he would be pleased to appear before any committee of the Senate and "freely, gladly, and unafraid meet any and all charges respecting my moral or other fitness to become a Member of this distinguished body": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the oath of office be administered to said FRANK L. SMITH; be it further

Resolved, That his credentials and all charges which may be filed or have been filed against him, and all objections that may be raised or have been raised as to his right to a seat in the Senate be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that committee is hereby directed to hear and determine all such charges and objections which may be submitted, and to report to the Senate after due inquiry and as early as convenient.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, when we come to vote upon the substitute of the Senator from Illinois, are we to vote upon the whole set of resolutions or one by one? There are several of them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They can be separated if that is desired.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Let us vote on them as a whole.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the hour is late, and I do not care to detain the Senate; but two remarks have been made upon this floor which I can not let go without having something to say about them. One was by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], that Senators who came here from the South after the Civil War were guilty of treason. The other was by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in reference to the negro vote of the South.

I shall not take the time of the Senate now to answer those two remarks. It was the first time that I knew that Chief Justice White of the Supreme Court was a traitor, and it was the first time that I have ever been told that Matthew Calbraith Butler, of South Carolina, one of the most dashing and gallant Confederate officers, and one of the greatest Senators this body has ever had in it, was a traitor. Both of those men were Catholics. I propose to show that they were not traitors, and I propose to show by the records which are now lying at my feet that that was not the question in the Butler case. I also expect to show that while people are resenting some things, it is time to resent some others.

I have no leader in this body. I do not attend caucuses. I did not do that in South Carolina, and I do not propose to do it in Washington. I am my own leader. I do not speak for the Democratic Party when I speak, or for any other party, except the men and women of South Carolina who sent me to this body. I make no apologies to anybody for what I say or do except to the people of South Carolina. I came here this morning to get the floor, but I gave way pleasantly and gladly to other Senators who wished to discuss the SMITH case, and I shall at another time answer my friend from Pennsylvania in reference to the negro question in South Carolina, and the Senator from Montana, who has been so kind as to say that my father and his three brothers, and that my mother's four brothers, who fought in the Confederate Army, were guilty of treason. I shall answer that in a way that will be thoroughly and distinctly understood, and what I say I will be responsible for in the Senate, to the Senate, outside of the Senate, at any time, in any way, and at any place that it suits any man who does not like it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN].

Mr. DENEEN and Mr. MOSES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who is absent on account of illness. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If present, the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. NEELY (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BORAH. I am authorized to state that if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. I understand that if the Senator from Minnesota were present he would vote "yea"; and if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. If the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BROUSSARD. I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained in his State. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]. These Senators are paired. So the resolution as modified was agreed to.

Whereas on the 17th day of May, 1926, the Senate passed a resolution creating a special committee to investigate and determine the improper use of money to promote the nomination or election of persons to the United States Senate, and the employment of certain other corrupt and unlawful means to secure such nomination or election.

Whereas said committee in the discharge of its duties notified FRANK L. SMITH, of Illinois, then a candidate for the United States Senate from that State, of its proceeding, and the said FRANK L. SMITH appeared in person and was permitted to counsel with and be represented by his attorneys and agents.

Whereas the said committee has reported—

That the evidence without substantial dispute shows that there was expended directly or indirectly for and on behalf of the candidacy of the said FRANK L. SMITH for the United States Senate the sum of $458,782; that all of the above sum except $171,500 was contributed directly to and received by the personal agent and representative of the said FRANK L. SMITH with his full knowledge and consent; and that of the total sum aforesaid there was contributed by officers of large public-service institutions doing business in the State of Illinois or by said institutions the sum of $203,000, a substantial part of which sum was contributed by men who were nonresidents of Illinois, but who were officers of Illinois public-service corporations.

That at all of the times aforesaid the said FRANK L. SMITH was chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, and that said public-service corporations commonly and generally had business before said commission, and said commission was, among other things, empowered to regulate the rates, charges, and business of said corporations.

That by the statutes of Illinois it is made a misdemeanor for any officer or agent of such public-service corporations to contribute any money to any member of said commission, or for any member of said commission to accept such moneys upon penalty of removal from office.

That said SMITH has in no manner controverted the truth of the foregoing facts, although full and complete opportunity was given to him, not only to present evidence but arguments in his behalf; and

Whereas the said official report of said committee and the sworn evidence is now and for many months has been on file with the Senate, and all of the said facts appear without substantial dispute: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the acceptance and expenditure of the various sums of money aforesaid in behalf of the candidacy of the said FRANK L. SMITH is contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and taints with fraud and corruption the credentials for a seat in the Senate presented by the said FRANK L. SMITH; and be it further

Resolved, That the said FRANK L. SMITH is not entitled to membership in the Senate of the United States, and that a vacancy exists in the representation of the State of Illinois in the United States Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I would like to have my negative vote recorded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The negative vote of the Senator from New Hampshire will be recorded.

ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY TO MONDAY

ADDRESS BY HON. CORDELL HULL, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, on April 13, 1927, Hon. CORDELL HULL delivered an address before the State League of Young Democrats, at Woodward, Okla., on the subject "Foundations of Democratic Success in 1928." I ask leave to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOUNDATIONS OF DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS IN 1928

It is apparent that confusion and misunderstanding exist relative to the significance and danger of the manifest political, moral, and economic evils that have appeared in our public affairs during recent years. Believing that these evils constitute a grave menace to the future of the Nation, and with no purpose to minimize or magnify other questions in which the people are interested, I desire to point out and clarify these vital and pressing issues in addition—issues which can not longer be neglected without irreparable injury to the spirit and integrity of our institutions.

History teaches that a democracy, when once corrupted, has never been reformed. It has invariably perished. The present outstanding abuses, violative of all the ideas which lie at the base of popular government, are driving the Nation on this downward course. It would be an untruth to deny that a great crisis confronts the country to-day.

Six years ago America was the greatest moral force of any nation in the world or in history. No free government has ever experienced a more corrupt and disgraceful period than has ours since that time. Commencing with Fall and Daugherty in 1921, and culminating with VARE and SMITH in 1926, our national character has been lowered and the American people humiliated by a chronic succession of huge and startling scandals, including a species of fraud and immorality in many appointments and in much of the public service. The result has been extreme political and moral debasement and a hopeless decline of official standards. The plea of accident will not lie against these connected and continuous abuses already extending over a six-year period. The Government evidently is in the deadly clutches of a commercialized political system, the success, if not the existence, of which involves bribery extending from administrative officials at Washington back to the wholesale corruption of State electorates. There is no blinking the fact that bribery, fraud, and immorality have become so deeply embedded in the practices of those in control of the party in power as to indicate their belief that corruption is essential to the government of the Nation. These festering growths, most dangerous to free institutions, are rapidly becoming a permanent part of our national life.

The most tragic and distressing commentary on the course of the highest officials of the administrations during this six-year period of national degeneracy is that no censure or righteous condemnation escaped them, although the bald facts were within reach of their observation, and no noticeable disposition to speed the prosecutions of the notorious offenders was shown. These leading officials and party spokesmen seemed instead to assume the complacent attitude of silent spectators, or consenting witnesses, uttering an occasional moral preachment for others. Many of them have not only stood for corruption but denounced those seeking to expose it. How many of those who sat through the Teapot Dome Cabinet meetings have uttered a word of condemnation? How long can the American people, in safety to their most cherished institutions, remain indifferent to the challenge of these widespread conditions of bribery, dishonesty, and immorality? If they are not of sufficient magnitude to make the party in power responsible, it would be impossible to state a case that would. Morals undoubtedly have not lost their power with the people. No greater or more pressing moral issue has been thrust upon the country within two generations.

The deadly blight of these domestic ills infected and paralyzed our foreign policies. Six years ago the attitude of other nations toward the United States was never better; to-day it was never worse. The lack of vision, practical knowledge, and morality in our foreign policies has been disastrous in the extreme. We have reaped a world harvest of economic and trade losses and of suspicion, contempt, and ill will. The party in power is justly chargeable with responsibility for these deplorable conditions. There is no hope of any real improvement in our relations with other nations except through the substitution of new and different political forces at Washington. The statement has become universal that for six years our Government has had no definite or adequate foreign policy. Under our slipshod and piecemeal policies we have drifted and muddled along until our moral influence has vanished utterly. Unless our interests are still more to suffer, this Nation must speedily adopt a constructive foreign policy embracing intelligent, practical, and systematic cooperation. There are many ways of sane cooperation to promote better understanding, friendship, good will, peace, and justice consistent with our Constitution and traditions. An unbiased and educated public opinion can be confidently relied upon in the future to deal wisely and adequately with all new foreign problems involving our rights, duties, and responsibilities arising under New World conditions.

During the past six years the dominant leaders of the political party in charge of the Federal Government have viewed with careless indifference the gradual collapse of agriculture, the greatest industry in America, measurably on account of neglect and mistreatment, without any serious effort or constructive plan or purpose to arrest and remedy the conditions of destruction and decay. The facts constituting this indictment are within the knowledge of every American farmer. Opposition to excessive tariffs, lower production costs, wider and better foreign markets, farm cooperation, and equality before the law, have comprised some of the economic policies of Democrats which have been consistently ignored by the party in power since 1920. A continued redistribution of property as between industry and agriculture is inevitable under existing inequitable economic policies.

Can the most indifferent citizen longer blind himself to the enormous vices and defects in the policies and practices of those in charge of the Federal Government? The people, in my solemn opinion, can not proceed too diligently to take stock of the forces in control of the Government since 1920 and of the political philosophy pursued. There is no truer axiom than that the perpetuity of a Republic depends upon a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles. The American people will readily discover what has often been stated, that the directing forces of our Government are confined to a relatively few persons of large pecuniary interests, who are primarily interested in building up their fortunes and families; whose thoughts and opinions are chiefly confined to those interests; who are naturally shaping legislation and government so as most to favor those interests; and who as a consequence rarely visualize the broad and fundamental principles of democratic government, the operation of which are so indispensable to equal justice. This narrow, vicious, and dangerous philosophy teaches that the first purpose of government is to extend discriminating favors to the few persons in control; that they may have privileges for themselves which are denied to others; that the most exclusive governmental favors to them are equally beneficial to the entire people; that a President who does their will may hold office indefinitely; and that they naturally and always should constitute the governing class. This is the coarse and sordid doctrine of materialism, which is rooted in selfishness and repugnant to the original ideals on which the Government was founded. Human rights, human welfare, national character, high ideals, morals, and Christian vitality, on which freedom and civilization must continue to rest if they are to endure, are matters of secondary consideration under our present purely materialistic Government since 1920. This cold, mercenary appeal, alien to the teachings of a Lincoln or a Roosevelt, is held out as the governing consideration for the American voter.

Every unbiased economist will testify that policies of equality, justice, and fairness alike to all afford a far broader and sounder base for permanent prosperity than the narrow and artificial base offered by ultra high tariffs and other handouts by the Government to a small cross section of business. In the face of this great economic truth, the few persons in control of the party in power, always scheming for supremacy and taking advantage of the wonderful economic position in which the World War left America, have widely circulated deliberately false propaganda modestly taking credit to themselves for any satisfactory business conditions existing and at the same time heaping upon the Democratic Party the absurd charge that it is not as "safe" for business. These dominant leaders dare not deny that the Democratic Party is "safe" in its championship and protection of human rights and human liberty; that, as the party in power, it had the ability and patriotism to lead America gloriously through the greatest war in history; and that it had the fairness and statesmanship to give business the Federal reserve system. But, according to the reckless insinuations of these Republican spokesmen, a party that has been just and fair and has rendered the greatest single service to business, that has served labor and agriculture as they were never served, and that can be trusted jealously to guard human rights, is not safe for "business." A slander so base could only emanate from corrupt, dishonest, or crooked business. The wreck of agriculture already has exposed its sham and miserable pretense.

The small number of persons who, seeing the psychological opportunity, seized the reins of power in the name of the Republican Party in 1920, have since ridden the country hard. There was never such a glaring instance of rule by minority in the history of free government. Agriculture, labor, and three-fourths of American business have had no real voice except by sufferance of the few in control. Urging their superior right to govern, they insist that in order to do so they are justified in resorting to fair means or foul. To this end the people are boldly taught the infamous philosophy that vast funds with which to corrupt the electorate of an entire State, as in the case of Pennsylvania, are contributed upon the same principle as money to the church. Those who preach and practice this doctrine are a greater menace to our free institutions than all the forces of Bolshevism and anarchy. Shall these sinister forces continue to eat away at the vitals of our political system? Here we have a brazen challenge to popular government. Shall the powers of government be corruptly controlled by the illicit use of money? Are not the people ready and willing to fight to remove these patent causes of popular decadence? How long will they be diverted by the hypocritical cry of "prosperity" and the vanishing myth of "Coolidge economy," both of which are intended to obscure moral idealism, official purity, justice, and popular rights?

In striking contrast is government, according to the political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson and the historic party he founded. It is an indestructible part of our national life. Three-fourths of the American people at heart favor the Jefferson philosophy. Its central truths are: Rule by the people, equality before the law, and the fullest measure of liberty to the individual. Freedom of speech, of the press, and of religion, the rights of the States, local self-government, determined opposition to paternalism and bureaucracy, the careful preservation of human rights and human welfare, social and economic justice, property rights, equitable taxation and economy, vision, morals, honesty, and high ideals are among the most-cherished teachings of Jefferson, as they are an inseparable part of the traditions and principles of the political party he organized.

The existence of questions of a nonpolitical nature has always been recognized by the Democratic Party, and their prompt consideration and solution in accordance with deliberate public opinion facilitated. This wise policy of the past is in strict accord with the doctrine of rule by the people as it is with the requirements of our two-party system of government. The Democratic Party offers the only available agency again to carry into effect the great doctrines of Jeffersonian liberalism. The names of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson are witnesses of what the Democratic Party is and for what it stands. The most recent record of service from 1913 to 1921 will forever stand out in history, while that of the opposing party since 1920 will only be remembered for its decayed morals and its colossal scandals and corruption.

The present dangerous trend makes extremely urgent a rededication, a rebirth, and a revival in the minds of the people of morals, honesty, high ideals, and of the whole theory, spirit, and fundamental principles underlying free government. The public conscience must again be awakened and the sense of the people quickened to the true value and meaning of government. The administration record of recent years presents a larger number of policies and practices to challenge the forces of liberalism than have been offered by any party in power: The wreck of agriculture, the collapse of foreign policy, corruption in politics and in government, the destruction of our once supreme moral influence and leadership in world affairs and the loss of all international good will, severe restrictions on foreign-debt repayments and on our export trade, which to-day should aggregate eight instead of five billion dollars, the decline of our merchant marine, excessive tariffs, the unchecked growth of paternalism and bureaucracy, the suppression of crime, indefinite presidential tenure, administration reform, restoration of rule by the people, the loss of all vision and high ideals, the lack of basic policies, and the bold attempt to conduct popular government on the single doctrine of sordid materialism.

The Democratic and independent opposition can only dislodge the insolent forces in power by unity, harmony, and teamwork at every stage. They can rally wholeheartedly in support of many great and inspiring issues, such as those just recited. Strife and dissention will be fatal. They must proceed instead with the knowledge that the great body of Jeffersonian Democratic doctrines of liberalism in importance is greater than any of its parts; that the combined forces supporting them are greater than any element or group or individual. With the subordination of single, minor, and personal considerations, and with unselfish, united effort to fight for general reform can and will succeed.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 20, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 19, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, we praise Thee that Thou art love. Thou hast taught us that the sublimest and greatest obligation of the soul is love. In the radiance of this virtue the humblest, the greatest, and the best men of earth have walked. So enrich our souls that out of them this gift shall flow until no shadow falls between us and our fellow men. O Spirit Divine, descend upon us and make us willing to help the right win and the best prevail. Take our gifts and make them Thine. Take our reason that it may ever seek the truth; take our will and make it free; take our heart and rest it on the bosom of the Father; take our imagination and merge it with the ideal of Thy beauty. The anchor of a good man is love! When at our desks, when in the forum, in the street, in business, or in the rest and quiet of home, may it hold. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MODIFICATION OF THE PROHIBITION LAW

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to address the House and to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have to-day introduced two bills for the modification and liberalization of the prohibition laws of the United States within the limitations of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. I have done so not with the conviction that these measures, if enacted into law, will solve the liquor question in this country, but as a first step in a program leading to that end. The problem, one of America's greatest, will never be solved until the eighteenth amendment has been repealed and legislation substituted that will aid in the movement for a correction of the evils of liquor and not, as the present laws do, aggravate those very evils.

There can be no doubt that the increasing social enlightenment in this great country, and, in fact, throughout the whole civilized world, demands an elimination of the abuse of alcohol. I am firmly convinced that further advancement will make of liquor a social outcast. This is proper and should be the ultimate aim.

This great object, however, can not be accomplished by legislation. Some kinds of legislation will assist, but it is primarily a social and moral problem. Social advancement comes and must come from an awakened consciousness within the people and not imposed from without, as by a law adopted, at best, at a doubtful time and by doubtful means.

The most pronounced effect of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment and the methods resorted to in attempting to enforce the Volstead law has been to discredit the whole Federal Government and create a rising resentment against any participation by the Federal Government in the internal affairs of the country. This reaction, growing rapidly, is seriously handicapping the enactment of legitimate and needed legislation by Congress to regulate for new problems the very nature of which must be under Federal supervision because of their interstate character. But so far has advanced this rising fear of an increasingly powerful centralized government, largely due to direct and indirect results of prohibition, that public opinion, striking out in self-protection, is refusing to sanction even needed new legislation by the Federal Government.

Even the majority of those who to-day support prohibition under the misapprehension that it means temperance are rising against the tide of increasing Federal encroachment of the rights of the people in local and State affairs. The very principle of the sovereignty of the individual States, a most necessary thing in a country so large and diverse in its local interests as the United States, is threatened by this tendency of the central Government of usurpation of the functions of local self-government.

This movement of substituting the Federal for State government if carried on, and it will be unless checked by vigorous public opinion, will surely mean the dissolution of this great Republic, for it can not continue half republic and half autocratic. It must be one or the other. In the hope of starting the movement back to the basic principles of a republican form of government and put a stop to this trend toward autocracy I offer two bills, both designed to restore the original principle of the proper relationship between the Federal Government and the State governments.

One bill, under the provision of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States that Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation, provides that the definition of intoxicating malt and cereal beverages shall be left to each individual State.

The bill further provides that each of the several States shall have the right by its own enactments to determine who may prescribe liquors for medicinal purposes and the nature and quantities that may be prescribed.

It is an insult to the medical profession of the country, an unwarranted interference in medical practice, and a tragedy of conceit for the Government to regulate by law the discretion of the individual doctor in prescribing medicine. Why not prescribe the number of medical books in his library, the number of medical instruments he may have, the amount of disinfectants he may use in a given month? There is as much reason to regulate the limits of all medicines a doctor may prescribe as to single out one medicine—liquor—and regulate that. The amount of medicine that would be necessary for one doctor, with a small country practice in a sparsely settled community, might be grossly inadequate for a doctor in a city with a large practice. The amount necessary for a young doctor just starting his practice bears no relationship to that necessary for an older doctor with a large practice. The Government recognizes the value of liquor at times, for in a Washington newspaper of December 21, 1927, there appeared a picture of four sailors of the American Navy carrying four cases of alcoholic liquor aboard a naval ship to be taken out to the rescue ship Falcon, from which diving operations were conducted for the attempted rescue of those aboard the ill-fated S-4. Are there any such ardent prohibitionists that they would object to this means of combating exposure of those courageous divers? But if alcoholic stimulant was needed then, there are many other occasions when it is needed. Who can devise legislation that can exactly anticipate each such emergency and prescribe by law for it? Now, either we recognize liquors as a medicine and then proceed to set ourselves above the medical profession in medical knowledge and prescribe for a doctor's patients by law without ever seeing his patients or we say liquor is not a medicine, but that we will permit the medical profession to be licensed bootleggers, only we prescribe the extent of their bootlegging operations. Either interpretation is a disgrace to the country and an unwarranted blight on the medical profession.

The other bill stipulates, also under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, for concurrent enforcement by Congress and the several States that the Prohibition Unit of the Federal Government and its agent shall confine their activities to interstate violations, and that enforcement within the States shall be the responsibility of the people of each State. This is a proper distribution of the functions of both divisions of government.

The proper function of the Federal Government is to regulate matters between States, but within the sovereign limits of the individual State the people of that State should enforce the laws. This also makes for an equitable distribution of the costs of enforcement. There is no reason why the people of one State where the prohibition law is widely obeyed and where, therefore, there is little need of great expenditure for enforcement, are forced to bear a disproportionate share of the cost of enforcement in some other State, where public opinion is such that a great expenditure of money is necessary in an attempt at enforcement.

This is all wrong and entirely unfair. The burden of the cost of enforcement should rest upon those who cause the burden. If my bill becomes a law, the people in dry States will not be paying the costs of enforcement in wet States.

Furthermore, to-day when a great effort is being made to reduce the burden of Federal taxes, the cut in the cost of enforcement to the Federal Government, both direct and indirect, would be a very substantial contribution to the cause of tax reduction. It is estimated that the direct saving in the reduction of the appropriation for Federal enforcement of prohibition, if the operations were limited to interstate violations would be from one-half to four-fifths. This would amount to from six to ten million dollars and the indirect saving would be many times that amount, as well as releasing the Federal courts to a large extent from the roll—and stigma—of cluttered police courts to the important business of expediting Federal litigation. The position to which we have reduced our Federal courts is no credit to the people of the United States. The sooner we return them to their proper dignity, the better it will be for the stability of the whole Government.

You can not belittle and discredit the courts of a nation and at the same time maintain proper and necessary respect for its government.

There will be no enforcement until the responsibility for enforcement is brought closely home to the people locally. The Federal Government in local matters is something apart and detached from the people. There can not be dual responsibility in the matter of enforcing the laws within the States.

There will be neither respect nor "obedience to two masters." Either the States must enforce the law within the States or the Federal Government must assume the whole burden. The present divided system means divided responsibility and results in chaos and no enforcement. Let us stop playing. Either return to the States themselves the right and sole responsibility of enforcing the prohibition law within the States or turn the whole job over to the Federal Government and go about it seriously. Appropriate the half billion dollars a year that is necessary and really try to enforce prohibition.

Let us be honest about this thing. There is no prohibition in this country, nor can there be under present conditions. Not questioning the sincerity of the Prohibition Unit of the Federal Government, it is a physical impossibility to enforce it with the present limited equipment and number of men available from present appropriations.

I would rather, under my oath of office to enforce the laws of the country, vote for an appropriation of $500,000,000 than for the present sum asked of twelve or thirteen million, which will simply be wasted in a Lilliputian effort to slay the giant.

I shall vote for appropriations, and for liberal appropriations to enforce prohibition while it remains on the statute books, but only so long as constitutional, legal, and decent methods are employed.

My oath of office and my conscience will compel me to refuse to vote a dollar if proof is shown that illegal, dishonest, and indecent methods are employed. I shall not support attempted enforcement if methods are used that are contrary to fundamental Americanism and the very Constitution itself.

Such methods as wire tapping, meter reading, inducing men to violate the law so that these men can be arrested for the sake of making a "record," merely show the desperation to which the prohibition forces have been driven in a futile effort to enforce an unenforcible law that is in opposition to public opinion. The recent election in Detroit, always one of the great law-abiding cities of the Nation, should be a warning to the people of the whole country. The fact that 48 per cent of the people of Detroit have come to the point where they voted for a candidate whose platform was that he would not even attempt to enforce the law is most significant. It should be the sounding of the tocsin! Why the people of this country are in virtual rebellion. It is not the fate of the cause of temperance that hangs in the balance, but the very continuance of this Government.

The United States is a hundred times more in danger of destruction through internal collapse as a result of the growing trait of national hypocrisy, largely as a result of prohibition, than from outside aggression.

Our wealth and enormous resources act as a protection from outsiders, but only accentuate our internal dangers. Never is there such need for individual and national intellectual honesty as in the face of great wealth and prosperity.

More civilizations have been destroyed in wealth than poverty; because the resultant easy life from prosperity breeds moral hypocrisy. On top of this growing condition in the United States we add gasoline to the fire by virtually legalizing and socially approving this hypocrisy in regard to prohibition. This spreads to every phase of our national life. The remedy is personal and national honesty.

Let us honestly face this prohibition question. A large portion of the people are in revolt. Let us either enforce the law or change it to meet the needs of the present social stage of the people.

While the law remains, put the enforcement up to the people by putting the responsibility up to them, or if the Federal Government is to meet the situation do it honestly. Admit the state of revolt, use the Army and the Navy, call out the National Guard, appropriate a half billion, or a whole billion if necessary, and either enforce the law or admit it can not be enforced. Anything short of this is hypocrisy, and hypocrisy of the worst kind, for it is undermining the whole fabric and structure of our social and political organization.

Why is this not done? Because the political proponents of prohibition are afraid of the test. They are afraid to tell the country just what it will really take to enforce prohibition. They are afraid to admit that they put over, under the stress and hysterical emotion of a great war, a law intended to be a moral reform before the people themselves were ready for it. The fact that such drastic and desperate methods are necessary to really enforce prohibition proves that the people were not ready and that public opinion does not support national prohibition.

But even if prohibition should be enforced by such methods—an army of Federal spies in our homes, offices, and clubs, supported by the armed forces of the Nation—granting that it did not cause the overthrow of our Government—it would not be desirable. Such prohibition would not represent any moral or social advancement.

If people are to make any strides forward in morality it must be by more than legal restraint, for if that restraint be suddenly removed then the morality goes a glimmering, and society is worse off than in the beginning.

True social advancement must be by moral education. Such progress as is thus made is independent of laws and can not be destroyed by a sudden change in the law. Some day the world will see total abstinence, but it will be voluntary abstinence not legal prohibition, and the great intermediate step toward that goal is temperance. Temperance is the moderate use, the elimination of the abuse, and not prohibition.

The proper regulation of liquor, such laws as are supported by public opinion and therefore can be enforced, coupled with unceasing educational work on the evils of the abuse of liquor, offer the only hope for accomplishing a real victory against liquor.

The only hope of the success of prohibition was that the next generation would know nothing of liquor. Who, foreseeing the actual tragic results, though, would have ever voted for prohibition?

The boys and girls who were from 7 to 10 years old when prohibition was passed and knew little, if anything, about liquors, to-day know more than the generation of their parents ever knew about it. To-day they not only know about it, but they know how to make it. They see it in their homes; they help make it; they are taught to circumvent and disrespect the law right in the very citadel of the sanctity of law and order—the home. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Seymour Lowman, in charge of prohibition enforcement, an able administrator, recently said publicly: "The young men and women of the country form one of the most serious bars to enforcement." The children are not to blame. It is the generation that produced that condition and that refuses to correct it.

We should admit our mistake and be courageous enough to humble our vanity that refuses to admit infallibility in law making and turn about and start over in the right direction. The American people are not going to accept this stupid blunder that our penchant for making the world good by law has led us into. Perhaps it is as well. We would, indeed, be a spineless people to submit to such an intolerable law. The only way, however, is to enforce the law the best possible in the meantime and change it just as soon as it is humanly possible to do so. Otherwise the danger is that the people, tiring of the political Gordian knot, tied by hypocrisy and political expediency, will take the short cut and slash the knot by nullification. That is the real danger of nullification. To try to change the law is not nullification; and these alleged drys who set up the hue and cry of "nullificationists" against those who wish by orderly process to change the law display the most cowardly type of insincerity and hypocrisy. They know that the Congress that makes a law can change that law any time it sees fit. Is it any more nullification to ask for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment now than it was to ask for its original adoption? Not a bit.

The American Bar Association is asked by its committee on criminal law and criminology to investigate the prohibition law and its administration because, it reports, "the criminal class which has been developed to evade the prohibition law is engaging in all manner of other crimes" and that the "official protectors" of the criminals have to protect them in their other crimes as well. This brings on, the report said, "a general lawlessness with killings, robberies, and the rest, and with few arrests, few convictions, and a rising distrust of the courts and officials generally among the people." This hardly sounds like praise of the prohibition law and its results. Is the American Bar Association a nullificationist? Yet, we are told that any one who criticizes prohibition is a nullificationist.

The real purpose of crying nullification is to raise a smoke screen to hide the tragic failure of prohibition.

The thing has gone so far now that there must be a clean sweep, and a start over again. It is tragic that we have to surrender the results of a hundred years' work for temperance in which great strides were made, because of this assinine attempt at prohibition. Assistant Secretary Seymour Lowman, a few weeks ago, also told a gathering at the Luther Place Memorial Church in Washington that "temperance and sobriety, rather than complete prohibition, should be the keynotes of the dry organizations' campaign to uphold the amendment."

This is an honest confession. Prohibition is a failure and the amendment is slipping. We must talk, not prohibition but temperance, to save the amendment. But why save it? If it does not accomplish the purpose, why not repeal it, and openly work for temperance. Those who scoff at the idea of bringing back legalized liquor to fight the evils of liquor should pause and consider the great principle of fighting fire with fire. That is the method of fighting forest fires. The rampant fire is controlled by a regulated fire. It is the principle employed by the medical profession—vaccination. Liquor must again be licensed so that it can again be brought under control to fight the growing colossal menace of the illegal liquor traffic and the dominance of the bootlegger. The saloon is gone and gone forever. Even the repeal of the eighteenth amendment would not mean the return of the saloon. It is not the saloon we are fighting, it is its insidious successor, multiplied many times, the blind pig or speak easy. If we took one-tenth of what prohibition cost us and used it for the purpose of educating the youth of the country away from liquor, we would do a hundred times more effective work for social advancement than we can ever do with any amount for so-called enforcement.

This matter should be put to the test—a vote. If the sentiment of the country is so overwhelmingly dry, as prohibition proponents allege, then they should welcome a show-down, and by the voice of the people put an end to the question.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

NOTICE OF AN ADDRESS ON FLOOD CONTROL AND CONSERVATION

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of making an announcement, that Prof. Clark Mickey, of the engineering department of the State University of Nebraska, will speak in the caucus room of the House Office Building, on the third floor, Friday evening at 8 o'clock p. m. on the subject of flood control and water conservation.

The subject is the great one that will attract our attention during this session of Congress. Professor Mickey has given much engineering thought and consideration to it. I am glad to extend an invitation to all Members of the House, and others who may be interested, to attend.

ESCORT FOR NAVY DEAD

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts asks unanmious consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I think the House ought to consider. I introduced a bill (H. R. 9503) on Tuesday, January 17, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to send a suitable escort with the Navy dead.

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to provide an escort for the bodies of deceased officers and enlisted men

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to furnish a suitable naval escort to the place of burial for the bodies of officers or enlisted men who have lost their lives in the naval service. Such expenses as are incurred for this purpose shall be made out of appropirations provided therefor by Congress: Provided, That section 1587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

At the present time the Army sends an escort with men who die in the military service. There is no provision of law authorizing the transportation at Government expense of the naval service to accompany the remains of officers or enlisted men who die while in the service.

Section 1587, United States Revised Statutes, provides:

SEC. 1587. (Funeral expenses.) No funeral expense of a naval officer who dies in the United States, nor expenses for travel to attend the funeral of the officer who dies there, shall be allowed. But when an officer on duty dies in a foreign country the expenses of his funeral, not exceeding his sea pay for one month, shall be defrayed by the Government, and paid by the paymaster upon whose books the name of such officer was borne for pay.

The above-quoted law is applicable to officers only. The Comptroller of the Treasury (11 Comp. Dec. 181), as indicated on page 905 of Laws Relating to Navy, Annotated, has held that this section—was clearly intended to prohibit the payment of any and all expense of travel to attend the funeral of a naval officer who dies in this country. There is no exception or reservation in the statute; it can make no difference in what capacity the officer attends the funeral, whether in connection with a battalion of cadets or as an individual, the prohibition is equally effective and the expense can not be allowed.

There is no law prohibiting the assignment of an enlisted man to accompany the remains of an enlisted man who dies in the naval service. However, I am informed by Medicine and Surgery—chief clerk—that enlisted men are not designated for that purpose because of the fact that there is no appropriation from which payment of their traveling and subsistence expenses could be made while so engaged.

Article 1841, Navy Regulations, 1920, subparagraph 4, provides:

(4) The remains of naval dead shall be prepared for interment or for shipment to their homes under the supervision of an officer, who shall determine by final inspection in each instance that the work of embalming, cleansing, shaving, and dressing have been competently performed, and that the encasement, clothing, etc., meet all the requirements of the occasion and comply with the terms of the contract.

The naval appropriation act for the current fiscal year, approved March 2, 1927 (44 Stat. 1289), provides, under the heading "Care of the dead"— for funeral expenses and interment or transportation to their homes or to designated cemeteries of the remains of officers (including officers who die within the United States) and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, of members of the Nurse Corps, reservists on active or training duty, and accepted applicants for enlistment, civilian employees of the Navy Department and Naval Establishment who die outside of the continental limits of the United States, and former enlisted men who are discharged while in naval hospitals and are inmates of said hospitals on the date of their death; for funeral expenses and interment of the remains of pensioners and destitute patients who die in naval hospitals; for purchase and care of cemetery lots; for removal of remains from abandoned cemeteries to naval or national cemeteries or to their homes, including remains interred in isolated graves at home and abroad, and remains temporarily interred, $75,000: Provided, That the above provision shall apply in the case of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who die while on active duty.

From an examination of the foregoing laws and regulations it will be observed that there is no existing provision of law authorizing the escort of the remains of persons who die in the naval service by persons thereof, nor is there any appropriation made by Congress out of which such transportation expenses could be defrayed.

The Surgeon General has stated that there has been a great deal of criticism of his service because they send no escort with the Navy dead.

The body of John Fennell, of Lowell, Mass., who died in the S–4 disaster, was sent by express from Boston to Lowell, Mass., with no escort. I know the Navy had no fund for that purpose, and I am sure it would be the wish of the House to provide such fund and that authorization be given to the Secretary of the Navy to send an escort with the Navy dead.

We have heard some of the Navy Department criticized by the families of the men who died in the S–4 disaster, but I want to say that Mr. and Mrs. William Fennell, the father and mother of John Fennell, and my constituents, in spite of their terrible grief have never uttered a complaint against the Navy and have never made a criticism of the care that their boy was given. The boy gave his life in the service, he worked for the service, he died in the service, and I believe his family has taken the attitude about his tragic death that every man who died in the S–4 disaster would wish his family to take. We all have reason to be very proud of John Fennell and his family. John Fennell gave his services for his country willingly and ungrudgingly. He gave his life for our flag, and he and his family have done nothing to dim the glory of his sacrifice. [Applause.]

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9481, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL]. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in August and September of this year I visited the Hawaiian Islands and at the request of the Secretary of the Navy I was furnished with the destroyer Burnes, which gave me an opportunity of visiting every harbor and every island of the Hawaiian group. Therefore I intend at this time to impart to you my conclusions and tell you what I saw there and what I think is beneficial to the Government.

The United States of America was exceedingly fortunate in acquiring the Hawaiian Islands. The strategic location, the fertility of the soil, and the character of the people living on them make this group of islands most valuable to our country.

AMERICANISM PREVAILS THROUGHOUT THE ISLANDS

If there is any doubt in the minds of those who live in the States as to the loyalty of those who live on the Hawaiian Islands, it should be dispelled. True Americanism exists in every part of each island, and only from the fact that the older generation of the Japanese require their children to attend a Japanese school after the hours of the public school, there would be no interference with true Americanism from even this source. But the Japanese boy and girl will soon rebel from attending Japanese schools and will become thoroughly Americanized and will discontinue the use of the Japanese language. The next generation, which will be the third, will undoubtedly populate these islands with a mixed people that will speak only one language and honor one flag.

DECLINE OF THE HAWAIIAN RACE A TRAGEDY

The greatest tragedy of the islands is the eventual extinction of the pure Hawaiian race—a happy, courageous, and lovable people, who gave the islands their essential character, who made them the land of song and poetry—but the intermarrying with other races is gradually decreasing the full-blooded Hawaiians. The passing of a race of people with such culture, charm, and lovable nature should be the regret of the Nation. Their place is being taken by part Hawaiians who in many cases have the high qualities of both races.

The Hawaiian Islands, composed of Hawaii, Maui, Oahu, and Kauai, which are the principal islands, together with Molokai, Lanai, and Niihau only sparsely settled, and Kahoolawe, which is uninhabited, secondary islands not under government of their own, make the entire group.

GOVERNMENT OF ISLANDS SATISFACTORY

The four principal islands are divided into county and city governments and all well organized. They have good roads, good sanitary conditions, and excellent water supply.

The capital of the entire group is Honolulu on the island of Oahu.

The entire group have the privilege of electing a senate with 15 members and a house of representatives with 30 members, who function similar to our State legislatures.

The governor and secretary are appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

While other officers and commissions are appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the Territorial senate, the judges of the supreme and circuit courts are appointed by the President.

The district magistrates are appointed by the chief justice of the Territorial supreme court.

In addition to these Territorial courts, there is also a United States district court with two judges, appointed by the President of the United States.

The voters elect a Delegate to the United States who is a Member of the United States House of Representatives and has all the rights and privileges of a Representative except the right to vote.

The people of the islands are happy and contented with this form of government.

SCHOOLS PROGRESSIVE AND PATRIOTIC

The schoolhouses are excellent buildings and well equipped. The teachers are of high character, and the students are alert and busy as bees.

While speaking to them in the high school at Hilo, the personnel being at least 80 per cent Japanese, when I said, "I am not French, although my ancestors were, and you are not Japanese or Hawaiians, although your ancestors are; you and I alike are Americans and should follow the Stars and Stripes," I received strong applause, and I am sure that Americanism will progress in the islands and be supported by all racial groups. [Applause.]

SUGAR AND PINEAPPLES TWO BASIC INDUSTRIES

The two basic industries are sugar and pineapples. The sugar grows in the valleys or level land and requires vast quantities of water and fertilization, while the pineapple grows on the high land, or mountain side, needs no irrigation, and very limited fertilization.

In raising pineapples, after the land is prepared and planted, mulch paper to a large extent is placed over the entire field. The pineapples are planted through the paper. The paper serves to hold the moisture in the ground and keeps the weeds from growing, and after the crop is harvested it acts as a fertilizer. The first crop of pineapples matures in from 20 to 22 months; the two succeeding crops will follow and mature in 12 months without replanting. Plantations usually produce but one staple crop.

The sugar industry has grown by leaps and bounds during the past 32 years. In 1895 the production of sugar was 150,000 tons, while in 1926 it was 787,246 tons, and is estimated to exceed 800,000 tons in 1927. The valuation of this crop is $67,872,940.

During all this period the sugar industry has had the benefit of a protective tariff.

The planters have formed a cooperative working agreement with labor, which has been very beneficial. They have organized experiment stations, which have played an important part in its growth.

FERTILE SOIL AND IRRIGATION NECESSARY FOR SUGAR RAISING

The fertility of the soil has also made sugar very productive.

The price of sugar affects the prosperity of the islands. When the commercial value reaches 4¾ cents per pound everybody becomes prosperous, because the planter divides the profits with the employee, and each of them participates in the prosperity.

On one sugar plantation, and not one of the best, I saw the records. The cost charged against the plantation for producing sugar was $397 per acre. The gross receipts were $603 per acre, showing a net profit of $206 per acre in 18 months.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is all of it cane sugar or is some of it beet sugar?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. All cane sugar.

I quote these figures to indicate the true value of the land. However, this large production has not come about without a great outlay of money for irrigation, without which much of the land would not produce sugar at all.

It takes large quantities of water, which is obtained from two sources—mountain streams by means of ditches and underground basins by means of wells and pumps.

I had the opportunity of going down in one of the wells of the Hawaiian Commercial & Sugar Co. This well is situated 120 feet above sea level. The pumping units are installed in underground chambers at the bottom of a vertical shaft which is 115 feet deep. The size of the shaft is 8 by 14 feet; the underground chambers are 22 by 35 feet, with an 11-foot ceiling, all lined with reinforced concrete 8 inches thick.

One hundred and forty feet of tunnel underground brings the water to a central basin and by pumps 40,000,000 gallons of water every 24 hours is raised to the surface and used for irrigation purposes.

While at the bottom of this well, having descended in an Otis elevator, I found myself 115 feet underground with living conditions as good as on top and a much more delightful temperature.

This well alone cost $150,000, and there are more than 300 irrigation wells of similar type on the islands.

PINEAPPLE INDUSTRY OF RECENT GROWTH

While this history of sugar runs back for a hundred years, the Hawaiian pineapple is of recent growth. During the last 25 years it has grown from nothing to $35,000,000 per year.

Hawaii leads the world both in quality and production of canned pineapple. Oahu Island has always been the center of pineapple production, but to-day pineapple companies are operating on each island.

ISLANDS ARE PROFITABLE TO UNITED STATES

Besides these two industries, coffee, rice, and bananas thrive. Livestock is also one of the principal industries. In fact, all available land is being utilized for agriculture, which is making the islands extremely rich and an important asset to the United States Government not only from a tax-paying standpoint but from a trading standpoint. They buy extensively from the States. The income tax from the islands in 1926 amounted to $6,797,074, and customs receipts for that year amounted to $1,748,241.

This summary is given for the purpose of showing the necessity for the development of the harbors of these islands. The future prosperity of the Territory of Hawaii depends upon two things: First, a protective tariff; and second, transportation by sea and by individual railroads and highways on each island.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I think it would be interesting to state at this point in the gentleman's speech that, since the United States has taken over the islands of Hawaii, the Government has expended there for public works something more than $16,000,000, exclusive of expenditures for the Army and for the Navy. During the same period there has been paid into the United States Treasury from the customs receipt and as income taxes from the Hawaiian Islands more than $126,000,000. So, financially, the people of the United States are something more than $110,000,000 to the good in the taking over of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman spoke about the stock-raising industry in the Territory of Hawaii. I simply want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the largest herd of registered cattle anywhere is on the Parker ranch in Hawaii.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes; the Parker ranch.

EACH ISLAND SHOULD HAVE A GOOD HARBOR

I have visted every harbor of any consequence on the islands, and after a careful survey of the respective islands I have come to the conclusion that each of the principal islands should have at least one well-developed harbor, with a full depth of 35 feet, safeguarded with a breakwater, and equipped with sufficient terminals to accommodate all boats, regardless of size, that may desire to enter the harbor. The Government should do its part on these harbors and at once, because the Territorial government is already doing its share. They are building terminals in anticipation of the deepening of the harbors. I shall, for your information, take up each of these harbors and give you a vision of the possibility of each one: Hilo Harbor, at the city of Hilo, on the east coast of the island of Hawaii, is a large and excellent harbor, but it needs the completion of the breakwater, which, when completed, will be 10,300 feet in length. Seven thousand nine hundred and sixty feet of this breakwater has been built, leaving a balance of 2,340 feet to complete the project. The dredging to make this channel 35 feet in depth is proceeding slowly. The development of this, the largest island, depends upon the building of Hilo Harbor and two additional small harbors, one on the south and one on the west coast. The city and Territorial governments have done more than their share in building terminals and advancing money for other purposes.

Kahului Harbor, serving the island of Maui at Wailuku, is a small harbor, but when completed will be adequate to take care of the commerce of the central part of the islands, which is growing rapidly, consisting of sugar, pineapples, and livestock.

At the present time there is one large terminal, with sunken freight tracks, conveyors, and well-equipped wharfage for loading and unloading, but it is not sufficient to accommodate the commerce. So the Territorial government is adding to the present wharf and is building another terminal on the opposite side of the harbor in anticipation of the Government making the appropriation of $1,250,000 to complete the breakwater so as to leave a clear opening of 600 feet at the entrance and dredge the harbor to a uniform depth of 35 feet. Early completion of this harbor will be of great assistance to the future prosperity and industry of the island.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield again just there?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Does not the gentleman agree that if these harbors he speaks of were developed it would so materially add to the health and income of the people of Hawaii, and consequently increase the receipts of the Treasury of the United States as to soon pay for the developments?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Four times over.

KAUAI ISLAND GARDEN SPOT OF GROUP

Kauai Island is the farthest from mainland and is in fact the garden spot of the Hawaiian group. It has 547 square miles of mountains, canyons, and plateaus, wonderful seashore, and a number of beautiful beaches. It has three distinct harbors, but none of sufficient size or with facilities to accommodate commerce.

So it has been decided to complete the Nawiliwiti Harbor, which requires the extension of its breakwater and deepening the channel.

The Territorial government is now building wharves and terminals, using the dredging material to make land for commercial purposes. When this harbor is completed it will be one of the best, will take care of all of the commerce of the island, and will attract large vessels that do not stop at the island at the present time.

HONOLULA HARBOR USED BY ARMY AND NAVY

Honolulu Harbor is the main shipping harbor of the entire group of islands, and of course it takes care of most of the incoming and outgoing freight; besides it accommodates all of the Pacific passenger boats and is used by the Navy and Army to a large extent. It is already crowded, and with the growth of Honolulu its capacity will be inadequate. Private interests have already dredged a channel 100 feet in width and 2,800 feet in length, connecting Honolulu Harbor with Kapalama Basin.

This channel should be 400 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length. It will cost approximately $775,000 to complete this work, but I regard it as a necessity and a project that should receive the attention of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and the Congress of the United States.

By making this connection it will give opportunity for immediate needed wharfage and a future building plan. The Territorial government is prepared to build the wharves and terminals and do additional dredging whenever and wherever it is necessary.

No city the size of Honolulu has been so progressive in building terminals of the latest design.

The Aloha Pier, which is just being completed, is a gem and would be a credit to any city in the United States. We should encourage such wonderful enterprise.

PEARL HARBOR

Pearl Harbor is a Navy base, yet it is not a Navy base.

Three harbors exist within a radius of 10 miles in length. Honolulu Harbor is quite restricted as to area, but the Territorial government has built a number of splendid wharves and piers, which accommodate the very considerable in-and-out traffic and are particularly useful for liners which are in port but a short time and discharge their cargo hurriedly in order that they may be on their way.

Recently private interests have cut a channel 100 feet wide from Honolulu Harbor proper to Kapalama Basin, another area of water equally as large as Honolulu Harbor. The channel itself, leading from the sea to this area, is called Kalihi Channel.

This for immediate use, as I have stated previously, should be cut 300 feet in width exclusive of the 100 feet already completed. The time will come when it should be 1,000 feet in width and should be extended in a general westerly direction into Kalihi Harbor as necessity requires, with the possibility that it may even at some future date reach Pearl Harbor on which the naval base is located.

By promoting a project of this kind the cost would be comparatively small because the material dredged could be placed on flat land and it would almost pay for the labor. The land that could be made by this construction of the extended Kalihi Harbor and channel outlet into the ocean would accommodate in and out shipping and such industry as requires water front in connection with ocean shipment.

Pearl Lochs, which make up the naval harbor known as Pearl Harbor, form a beautiful sheet of water; which, however, is somewhat deceptive from the deep ship point of view in that a great part of the lochs is still in shallow water.

The entrance to the lochs was originally quite shallow and the channel crooked.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. I fully agree with the gentleman as to the development of Pearl Harbor. Has there been any estimate of cost made as to the development of the other harbors which the gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. They are all projects that have already been passed upon. The only thing remaining is to get the necessary appropriation.

Mr. ARNOLD. An estimate of cost has been made?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Contracts have been recently let for deepening and straightening this channel in order that it may accommodate capital ships, which have not heretofore been able to come to the navy yard.

This channel will be 600 feet wide and 45 feet deep from the entrance bar to a point opposite Fort Kamehameha where the swell no longer exists and from which point it will be 40 feet deep to the navy yard and a turning basin just west of the navy yard between the navy yard and Ford Island, which is the Navy aviation center.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman perhaps is also aware that at the present time it is not possible to take into the harbor, under its own steam, a major naval vessel.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is correct.

From the navy yard and turning basin the channel loops entirely around Ford Island with a depth of 35 feet, so that deep-draft ships will be enabled to come not only to the navy yard but to navigate entirely around Ford Island, as there is some additional deep water available to anchor in all of the upper part of the East Loch.

This channel will be very helpful but will not give a sufficient expanse of water for the whole fleet. And additional dredging should be prosecuted even after this channel is completed in order that there may be area for fleet assembly in time of stress.

The Fort Kamehameha Reservation borders the ocean on the Honolulu side at Pearl Harbor and extends for 3 miles along the beach. Most of this area is swamp land which the dredging operation will reclaim. When this land is reclaimed it will make a wonderful aviation field for the Army. An appropriation to purchase this site for Army aviation should be made.

The principal reason why long-distance overseas efforts have not proceeded beyond the Hawaiian Islands lies in the fact that there is no sufficient long take-off for planes heavily loaded with fuel as they must be for a flight of several thousand miles. So, by perfecting this field with dredging this will be accomplished.

NAVAL BASE OF FIRST IMPORTANCE

Our naval base is an outstanding reason for our acquisition of the islands, advancing the defense of the Pacific coast as it does more than 2,000 miles into the Pacific Ocean. The work that is being done is converting a site for a naval base, putting it actually into a naval base, but much remains to be done and appropriations should be generous and continuous until an adequate base is established. Otherwise, the country is unjustified in maintaining as it does a very considerable portion of the Army on the island of Oahu.

The naval base is, at the present time, sorely in need of berths for ships along the navy yard water front. There is now but one considerable wharf in front of the shops for ship-repair purposes, and ships must be brought close to the shops for materials and for labor for economical repair and upkeep. There should be forthcoming in the next appropriation bill funds for a ship-repair basin. The shops are fairly adequate for the time being, but they must in time be extended to meet the conditions.

There are two things that must be settled and at once: First, the improvement of the water front, and second, the settlement of the question as to Ford Island for aviation purposes.

THE NAVY SHOULD HAVE EXCLUSIVE USE OF FORD ISLAND

At the present time the War and Navy Departments are using Ford Island for a flying field. The growth of aviation has been so rapid and it is now so well recognized as an arm of defense that arrangements must be made to use it for the protection of the islands. The number of projects for both the Army and Navy are such as to cover for each more space than is available on Ford Island. So, it is my belief that the Army, which is well supplied with land, should be moved off Ford Island entirely and it should be given up to the Navy for their exclusive use. Ford Island will furnish none too great facilities for an assembly, repair, and training base for the Navy. Besides, it is in the midst of the Navy activities, and true economy requires that the naval air base be adjacent to the navy yard in order that facilities there may be available without duplication.

I would suggest that the Navy should have full jurisdiction within the limits of Pearl Loch.

In Pearl Harbor, at the present time, there is one dry dock of sufficient size to dock the largest warships, and one small marine railway suitable only for such craft as submarines.

So there should be additional dry-dock equipment to accommodate all of the ships that go to Pearl Harbor. It is true that there are many shallow areas in Pearl Harbor which must eventually be used by dredging them to the depth necessary.

In the development of Pearl Harbor ship berths will be made by exactly the reverse process to that used in ordinary commercial harbors, where piers are in general carried out from the fast land, thus encroaching upon the water area.

At Peafl Harbor such cuts will be made by dredging into the shoal areas or even into the fast land in some cases, and the dredging spoil must either be carried to sea or deposited in low areas lying well back of the present water front.

COMPLETION OF NAVY BASE MEANS SAFETY OF PACIFIC COAST

It is the belief of those who are well posted on Pearl Harbor that every available area will be needed for the fleet. It is my belief that the United States Government should not delay in completing the depth of the channels leading to the harbor and deepening the harbor to its full area, increasing the capacity of the wharves, building the necessary slips for berthing of vessels, increasing the shops to the strength necessary to take care of up-to-date naval base, moving the Army from Ford Island, and giving the entire island to the Navy, completing the necessary buildings out of cement, and conclude by making this the greatest Navy base of the world. And I can assure the Congress of the United States, if this is done, this Nation will be safe from any attack in the Pacific. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me now, please?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested and much pleased with the speech of the gentleman from Illinois. As a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House and as the chairman of its subcommittee on yards and docks, and after having carefully inspected Pearl Harbor on two different occasions and studied the needs thereof, I commend the speech of the gentleman from the State of Illinois to the careful consideration of every Member of this House. The gentleman has the facts, he has presented them in a fine and splendid way, and in such a way as to reflect credit upon a Member of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman prefaced his remarks—and they were full of information for the House—with a statement that the Secretary of the Navy had kindly furnished him——

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I did not say that. Do not put that in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Or that the Navy——

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I did not say that. I said at the instigation of the Secretary of the Navy I was furnished with it. Do not misquote me, please.

Mr. BLANTON. At the instigation of Secretary Wilbur?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I did not say that.

Mr. BLANTON. At the instigation of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I did not say that.

Mr. BLANTON. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Just repeat my words and not anything else. Do not put anything in the RECORD that I did not say.

Mr. BLANTON. Whatever the gentleman said, he said he was furnished with the destroyer Burnes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I will cease to yield if you try to put something in the RECORD I did not say.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I decline to yield further.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Not on that basis.

Mr. BLANTON. I will get my own time directly to discuss the matter.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. All right.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] six minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in reference to the appropriations for the Interstate Commerce Commission. We all realize that rate making is a legislative function. We can not do that ourselves, and so we have created the Interstate Commerce Commission as our agent for that purpose. The commission being our agent, we ought to be extremely solicitious about the way the commission is furnished in the way of funds to carry out our work. During the past five or six years there has been considerable trouble with the Director of the Budget in not allowing to the commission the funds the commission requested. There has been considerable progress made from time to time in raising the Budget figures. That has been largely due to the work of the subcommittee and the support the House has given it in overriding the Budget. The Budget has gradually become more liberal, but there is still room for improvement. This year the commission requested $81,000 more than what was in the Budget estimate for 25 more attorney-examiners, so that they could keep up more currently with their own work. The figures show, as will be seen on page 428 and on of the hearings, that if the commission was to do nothing else, if there were to be no other cases filed for the next 23 months, it would take them all that time to dispose of cases now pending before the commission.

These are very important matters; in some cases they mean the life of the industry affected. I have in mind a particular matter brought to my attention last fall where until the commission could render a decision in a particular case the factory could not open up, because they did not know anything about whether they could reach the market.

There is no work more important, more vital to the interests of the country than the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Has the gentleman any idea of how many cases are pending before the commission?

Mr. NEWTON. I will give that to the gentleman in a moment. In 1923 the formal cases of suspension and investigation were 1,455. In 1927 that figure had risen to 2,017, an increase of 562. In formal cases disposed of in the period of 1922 there were 1,201 during that year. In 1927 there were 1,465, making an increase of 264. In 1922 the formal cases pending were 1,953, and in 1927 that figure had risen to 2,721, an increase of 768.

The informal cases filed in 1922 were 5,641, and in 1927 that figure had increased to 8,628, an increase of 2,987.

Under these circumstances it is apparent that they can not get up with their work unless they are given more and competent help. They can only absorb a certain number of additional help every year. If they take on men above a certain number they can not train them properly.

Now, when they ask for 25 more attorney-examiners it seems to me that Congress ought to grant the request.

I appreciate the position of the subcommittee. They do not like to continually override the Budget, but I am in hopes that either in the House or at the other end of the Capitol there will be granted $81,000 additional that the commission requested. It is only in that way that they can keep up this work.

Mr. GOLDER. What is the status of the matter as far as the House is concerned?

Mr. NEWTON. The subcommittee granted everything within the estimate of the Budget. They made some slight addition in the item of printing, so that they can keep the reports more up to date. This is a matter that can be passed upon either by the House or the other side of the Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to talk about a matter that is of much importance not only to the people of the Mississippi Valley but to the entire country.

The flood of 1927 was the greatest recorded in the history of the Mississippi River. This flood was preceded by months of unusual rain, but it is doubtful whether such rainfall a decade ago would have caused such high flood levels in the Mississippi River.

Primarily these flood levels are the immediate consequence of raising the height of the levees on the banks of that stream.

But the amount of flood water coming down that great river has actually increased in volume in the last 10 years, for during that time those States which are drained by the Mississippi River have been extensively engaged in establishing and completing various drainage projects. As this drainage work progressed, swamps, sloughs, and other depressions which for centuries had been natural reservoirs were drained and the water which formerly accumulated in those reservoirs was, by drainage ditches and canals, rapidly carried to the rivers of the Mississippi Valley.

The rainfall during the latter part of 1926 and the early part of 1927 may have been unusual, but it was nothing more than one of nature's readjustments. For nearly two years a drouth prevailed both in the United States and in Canada. On two occasions this House passed bills temporarily removing the tariff on cattle so they could be driven to Mexico for water. During the same time the level of the Great Lakes fell so far below normal that much damage was done to the ports of those inland seas.

Nature can not escape the law of averages. And so in obedience to this inexorable law, an unusual drouth was broken by an equally unusual rainfall.

Rare, indeed, is the fall of the year when there is not a low water stage of the Mississippi River. But in November and December, 1926, a full river was waiting for the spring rise, which always comes in the early part of the year.

The story of the flood of 1927 has been often told. Vicksburg, where I live, situated on the Yazoo River where it flows into the Mississippi, was in 1927 perhaps more nearly the flood center than any other city in the lower valley. It was the nearest place of refuge for thousands of unfortunate flood sufferers. It was the headquarters of the Red Cross not only for Mississippi but for parts of Louisiana and Arkansas, and that great humane organization registered at Vicksburg over 32,000 refugees.

In that place at 3 o'clock in the morning I have seen one boat unload over sixteen hundred refugees. I vividly recall one afternoon, when the last rays of the setting sun had turned to burnished gold the rippling waters of that vast inland sea at the foot of the hills of Vicksburg, a large barge loaded with human freight came slowly into port. Upon that barge were hundreds of half-famished negroes, many of whom had been taken from the roofs of their submerged homes. Just before the city of refuge was reached that great throng of homeless, hungry unfortunates fell upon their knees, and over the waters there came to us from the melodious throats of hundreds of negroes the familiar words, "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings Flow."

Several times on crowded barges, crazed by suffering, exposure, and hunger, some poor unfortunate refugee would go insane and in his raving frenzy either indiscriminately attack those nearest him or else attempt to throw himself overboard.

In less than 24 hours after the levee broke, Greenville, Miss., a city of approximately 17,000 inhabitants, was under water. Thirty days afterwards, riding in a motor boat over one of the streets of that city, I was unable to touch bottom with a 6-foot oar.

Over a month after the land was overflowed I rode in a motor boat all day and saw nothing to vary the monotony of that waste of water save an occasional half-demolished house with a hole cut in the roof, showing where the unfortunate dwellers had rushed to safety. Under those destructive waters were some of the finest and most improved plantations in America. On every 20 acres or less before the flood there stood substantial dwellings and outhouses, but now all were washed away and had disappeared.

In that one county alone over twenty-five hundred houses were torn from their foundations, while the loss in cattle and livestock was so great that it can only be estimated.

But these material losses, distressing though they were, sink into insignificance before the appalling tragedy of 1927—the heavy toll of human life exacted by that flood. Mr. Chairman, earthly possessions may be swept away and disappear forever, but through industry, ingenuity, and skill vanished fortunes may return again.

But all the strength and power of this mighty Government and all the industry, ingenuity, and skill of its brave and resourceful people can never bring back and restore to their families and friends even one of the hundreds of unfortunate human victims whose untimely deaths made the flood of 1927 "the greatest peace-time calamity in the Nation's history."

After years of toil and sacrifice the people of the Mississippi Valley believed that the problem of flood control of the great river at last had been solved. With gratitude toward the Federal Government for all it had done, and with pride in the realization that by their own achievements, which had resulted in an expenditure of over $290,000,000, they themselves had helped to bring about this happy consummation, they felt that their anxiety was over and that they could now reap the reward which years of labor and toil and sacrifice had placed within their grasp.

But the flood of 1927 came. It did what no other flood did. It interrupted over 3,000 miles of railroad transportation, flooded over 12,000,000 acres of land in 174 counties in seven States, and carried on the tawny bosom of its rushing waters far more than the homes and the worldly possessions of the people of the Mississippi Valley. As flood levels never before even dreamed of were reached, there vanished the hope and the confidence which for generations had sustained them.

It was not the material loss caused by that great flood which accomplished that which no other flood could ever do. It was not the sufferings and hardships of those who were forced to climb to the roofs of their submerged homes and indefinitely wait for rescue. It was not the financial loss of those who saw their cattle and livestock drown before their eyes and the accumulated savings of a lifetime swept away. The flood of 1927 did far more than this. It destroyed the hopes of over half a century, and, breaking down their morale and fortitude, took the very heart out of the people of the Mississippi Valley.

Gazing upon that vast inland sea whose raging waters had rendered over 700,000 people homeless, and knowing that they were unable to further help themselves, they realized that after years of endeavor and exertion, after hundreds of millions of expense, of taxation up to constitutional limitation for flood protection, all their strivings of the past had been vain and useless.

Realizing this, there came the awful fear that they would be forced to abandon the homes they had wrested from the wilderness, homes in which their children were born and around whose firesides clustered the recollections of years of sacrifice and toil.

They feared that they would have to abandon those homes and turn back to the trackless jungle that great section of our country, more fertile than the far-famed Valley of the Nile, unless the strong arm of the Federal Government could be extended; for after the flood levels of 1927 had been reached they realized that the Federal Government alone was the only earthly power that could control the rushing waters from the Alleghenies to the Rockies, which, draining over 30 States, poured into the cornucopia of the lower Mississippi Valley.

President Coolidge tells us in his message to Congress that the owners of lands behind the levees should pay a proportionate part of the expense of building these levees. He further said—that an extraordinary concession from the plan adopted in relation to irrigation, where the general rule has been that the lands benefited should bear the entire expense, has already been made to the owners of lands behind these levees.

He also said:

It is the land of this region that is to be benefited. To say that it is unable to bear any expense of reclamation is the same thing as saying that it is not worth reclaiming.

I am sure that the President of the United States is sincerely anxious to do all he can to prevent another great national disaster like that of 1927. He expressed his sympathy to us in many ways. In less than 24 hours after the levee broke we had assurances from him that he would do all in his power. He sent one of his great secretaries down to help us, Mr. Hoover, who did splendid work, but I regret that the President believes the building of levees to keep within its bounds a mighty river, whose drainage area is equal to over 40 per cent of the entire United States, a river whose watershed embraces 31 of these States and two Provinces in Canada, a river upon whose ample bosom in 1926 there floated over 17,000,000 tons of commerce, valued at over $700,000,000. I regret that he believes that the building of levees to hold back the waters of such a river is a reclamation project.

With all deference to the opinion of the President of the United States, there is, to my mind, a great difference and distinction between reclamation and levees. Reclamation creates, while levees retain and protect.

Reclamation begins after levees are built. Reclamation adds value to that which is valueless. Levees protect that which has value. Reclamation gives something to the man that he never had. Levees keep the river from taking away from the man something he already had.

Reclamation takes a sandy desert and converts it into fields of wondrous beauty and marvelous fertility. Levees protect farms, cities, railroad tracks, stations, terminals, factories, telephone, telegraph, and electric power lines from being destroyed.

Does a road built up through a swamp reclaim that swamp? Do the levees take one gallon of water off of the lands behind them? Do they reduce by one dollar the cost of preparing these lands for cultivation?

When the sturdy pioneers drove the aboriginal Indians from the plains of the West, did they by so doing reclaim those lands, or did they make it possible for settlers to come in and make those great plains one of the garden spots of the world?

Building a levee on the bank of a stream does not clear the land behind it of standing timber nor drain from it its surface waters nor prepare it for cultivation.

Levees do not reclaim lands. All that they do is to make possible the development of the lands behind them. Levees made it possible for over 6,000 miles of railroad tracks and over 50,000 miles of electric power, telephone, and telegraph lines to be built.

They made it possible for the development of farm lands which, in 1926, produced over $250,000,000 of farm products. They made it possible for populous cities and thriving towns and busy factories to be found all over the Mississippi Valley.

Levees made all this possible, and they justified the issuance of bonds for concrete highways, drainage districts, and other land improvements, but they did not reclaim one acre of that vast territory drained by the Mississippi River.

President Coolidge tells us that it is the land of this region that is to be benefited, and that the land so benefited must pay for part of this reclamation.

The Presidency of the United States is the greatest political office in the world. Though many channels of information and many avenues of investigation, denied to any other citizen of the United States, are open to the holder of that high position, yet, owing to the manifold and complex interests continually arising in the greatest country in all the world, it is impossible for one man, no matter how well informed he may be, to have an actual personal knowledge of every subject.

It is therefore a source of much regret that the varied and many duties of the Chief Executive of the Nation were such that the President was unable to spare the time and visit the scene of the great disaster of 1927.

Had he been able to do this, I am sure that the first-hand information he would have secured would have convinced him that the owners of lands behind those levees had reached the end of their resources and were utterly unable to meet the demand he has imposed upon them.

The land behind the levees is only a small part of the property that is to be benefited. Cities, towns, factories, railroad tracks, terminals, stations, telegraph, telephone, and electric-power lines are also benefited, for it is impossible to protect the lands without protecting them, and it is impossible to protect them without protecting the lands upon which they are situated.

Hundred of millions of dollars from citizens all over the United States are invested in mortgages on land, in bonds, and in factories and public utilities of the Mississippi Valley.

In mortgages on lands and in bonds other than levee bonds, there is an outstanding indebtedness of over $770,000,000. The assessed valuation of the property so mortgaged and bonded is less than $815,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. As a matter of fact, would not the benefit accrue to the whole country?

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman's question is very apt. There is $770,000,000 invested in mortgages on land and in bonds and $45,000,000 is still outstanding of levee bonds. Now, the assessed valuation of the lands so bonded and so mortgaged aggregates $815,000,000.

In addition to this, millions of dollars are invested in the securities of the various railroad, telephone, telegraph, and electric-power companies by citizens who live in every part of the United States, for the local ownership of these securities is negligible.

The man from New York, the man from California, and the men from 40 other States in this Union are just as much interested in seeing their property in the Mississippi Valley protected from ruin and overflow as the man from Mississippi or Louisiana or Arkansas who owns the land immediately behind these levees.

The Manufacturers Record asks this pertinent question:

Is it then just or reasonable to require the farmers who live on the land in the seven affected States to pay a special assessment on their particular form of property, while exempting the owners of the other forms of property who live in the other 41 States?

Mr. GOLDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. GOLDER. Assuming that the suggestion made by the President is a fair one, are the people along that territory in a position at this time to finance the building of the necessary protection?

Mr. COLLIER. They are not. They have reached the end of their resources. If the plan suggested by the President is a fair one, that the local interests should contribute a part of the cost, even though what is done is for the purpose of maintaining navigation in the greatest artery of trade and commerce in the world—and in 1926, which are the last figures I have, there passed down that river over 17,000,000 tons of commerce, valued at over $700,000,000—if that view should be taken of it, the people living behind those levees have already expended $290,000,000, and the Federal Government has expended for that same purpose less than $70,000,000. I ask you, gentlemen, after they have already contributed $290,000,000, or over four times as much as the Federal Government has contributed, in the name of high heaven how much more do you want those people to contribute whose homes have been washed away, whose cattle and livestock have been destroyed, who are now prone and helpless and have reached the end of their resources. How much more do you want those people to contribute?

In the early days of the Republic the entire country was in the scope of a President's vision. George Washington sent three messages to Congress, all relating to the commerce and navigability of the Mississippi River. He did not let the matter rest with these messages, for later he sent Thomas Pinckney to the Spanish Court for the sole and express purpose of entering into negotiations with Spain for the enjoyment of these rights.

"Dipping into the future as far as human eye could see," Thomas Jefferson made the Louisiana Purchase, and by the mere stroke of a pen added more millions of leagues of permanent territory to his country than any conqueror had ever done by the sword. One of the compelling factors which actuated the purchase of that great domain was the important part the Mississippi River would play in the commerce and national defense of the country.

The infant Republic was destined to soon become one of the great powers of the world. With the vast development of our almost unlimited resources, it was impossible for any President to have a personal understanding of every problem, no matter how important it may have been. The opinions, therefore, of those who had personal knowledge are of special value.

Clay, Lincoln, and Garfield lived in the Ohio Valley and had first-hand information. Henry Clay in an impassioned burst of oratory in the United States Senate once said:

The Mississippi River with all its tributaries constitute a great system, and if the system be not national, I should like to know one that is national.

Abraham Lincoln tells us that—

The most general object I can think of would be the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

He then gave one of those illustrations for which he was famed, when he stated there was no difference in principle between driving a pirate from the tracks of commerce on the ocean and the removal of a snag on the Mississippi.

For—

Said he—

each is done to save life and property, and to use the waterways for the purpose of developing commerce.

President Garfield said that—

The statesmanship of America must grapple with the problem of this mighty stream; it is too vast for any State to handle; too much for any authority other than that of the Nation itself to manage.

President Roosevelt knew the Mississippi River and the Mississippi Valley. He had frequently visited the cities and towns in that valley, and he had on more than one occasion hunted bears in the swamps of that river.

His constant thirst for knowledge useful to him in his high place, together with his familiarity with that section, entitled him to speak with authority. He said after one of his visits to the Mississippi Valley, "We"—the Nation—"must build the levees and build them stronger and more scientifically than ever before."

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that those living behind the levees on the Mississippi River have already expended for flood protection over $290,000,000, or more than four times as much as the Federal Government has for this purpose. Yet it is manifest that if the owners of those lands had never spent one dollar toward levee building it would still be the duty of the Federal Government, in the interest of navigation and commerce as well as in the interest of justice and humanity, to take charge of a situation which by reason of the magnitude of the undertaking and the complexity of its interests is far beyond the control of any local authority.

Each of the great political parties has repeatedly affirmed this principle.

Speaking through their various platforms the Republican Party declared:

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare.

The Democratic Party declared:

We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of overflow of land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property imposes an obligation which alone can be discharged by the Federal Government.

Surely no one will deny that upon the Federal Government alone rests the responsibility of maintaining navigation upon the Mississippi River. If levees are essential to proper navigation, then it is the duty of the Federal Government, whether the land behind those levees is suitable for agricultural purposes or not, to build those levees.

I shall ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the RECORD extracts from what the engineers have stated along that line, as I do not care to take up the time of the House with reading all these different extracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Bernard and Totten in their report of the Mississippi River in 1822 advised the construction of levees solely in aid of navigation.

Lieutenant Colonel Suter, of the United States Engineers, stated in 1880 before a committee of Congress that the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River for navigable purposes without levees was impossible.

The Mississippi River Commission states in their report of 1882—that levees would produce a maximum effect in channel improvement at a minimum of cost.

Colonel Leach, of the United States Corps of Engineers, gave before a congressional committee an illustration of how the erection of a levee at Plum Point Reach, above Memphis, improved the navigable depth of the river.

General Kingman, a former Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, said at one of the hearings before Congress:

I should consider that the levee is a very important means of improving navigation.

Colonel Townsend, one of the ablest engineers of his time and president of the Mississippi River Commission, stated:

My own view of the effect of levees on stream flow is that they tend to remove irregularities and make the slope more uniform.

Mr. Chairman, if the building of levees are essential to good navigation, why should they be singled out for local contributions? Engineers have repeatedly declared that building levees, revetting banks, dredging channels, and removing snags are all essential to good and proper navigation.

Has anyone ever advocated the payment of local contributions from riparian landowners for revetment work? Revetment is not only essential to navigation, but incidentally the landowners are benefited, for revetment prevents the banks from caving and the lands from being washed away.

Who has ever insisted that the landowners shall be assessed to pay part of the cost of dredging the channel of the Mississippi River? Yet the landowner receives an incidental benefit, for the deeper the channel the more water the river will hold, and to that extent will be less likely to overflow adjacent lands.

Removing snags from the channel prevents accident and permits boats to navigate the Mississippi River without the fear of destruction. If these snags were permitted to remain, a boat would be afraid to venture from the shore. The landowners would therefore in many instances have no way of getting their products to market and consequently land values would decline. Therefore removing snags from the bed of the river incidentally benefits riparian landowners, but where is the man who will insist that the landowners pay to the Federal Government a proportionate part of the cost of the removal of snags?

When the Federal Government dredges a harbor and makes it possible for that harbor to be open to the commerce of the world, railroads will immediately establish terminals which will inevitably result in an incidental benefit to lands situated on the water front which will be enhanced in value.

Is there a Member of this Congress who will say that because lands in the vicinity of that harbor will be enhanced in value that the Federal Government should discontinue keeping that channel open to the commerce of the world until the owners of those lands which have been incidentally benefited shall pay part of the cost of dredging and keeping open that harbor?

If a mob were to assemble in one of our largest States and invade a weaker State in such force that the invaded State was unable to drive it back, would that be only a local matter, or would it not be the duty of the Federal Government to intervene and protect one of its States from the unlawful aggressions of the citizens of another State?

When a great devastating enemy, the cruel waters from nearly half of this Union invade a section of our country, destroying not only lands and property but the lives of American citizens, is that a matter of local concern? Shall this great Government of ours, the richest and most prosperous in the world, and which at the same time is the hope and the envy of all Christendom, protect its own citizens? During the greatest war of all the ages our Government not only financed itself but its allies. When Europe was threatened with financial disaster, it extended across the water a helping hand, and reestablished European credit, balanced European budgets, and stayed the further depreciation of European currency.

Shall the strong arm of that Government be extended to ward off those cruel waters, or shall that great Government stand idly by until the families of those who have lost their lives together with others whose accumulated savings of a lifetime have been swept away, shall again dig into their now empty pockets and pay to that Government a sum of money which conflicting authorities might determine would be their cost of repelling the attack of the rushing waters from nearly half of the United States and from part of the Dominion of Canada?

Has any city, town, or State in America jurisdiction over any part of the Mississippi River? No boat can sail upon its bosom, nor can a pilot direct its course without each first securing the consent of the Federal Government. Not one single place from Lake Itaska to the Gulf can this mighty river be bridged without the approval of the Federal Government.

When the city of New Orleans wished to cut the Poydras Levee on the other side of the river to prevent a catastrophe which might have resulted in loss of life and destruction of property fearful to contemplate, the great State of Louisiana and the metropolitan city of New Orleans were both helpless in the face of that awful danger and could make no move until sanctioned by Federal authority.

If it be the policy of the Federal Government, the wisdom of which I have yet to hear denied, to exercise control over every part of the Mississippi River, does not this exclusive right to absolute control carry with it a corresponding duty to keep that river within its bounds?

From the remotest antiquity rivers have played an important part in military activities. The Mississippi River is a part of our system of national defense. In the event of war, or in a great national emergency when it might be necessary to expeditiously transport men and supplies to and from the West to the East, for a situation to recur like that of 1927, when from Cairo to below the plains of Chalmette practically all railway and highway traffic was indefinitely interrupted might result in injury incalculable and irreparable.

Divided effort and divided responsibility can no longer control the Mississippi River.

Even if the citizens of the lower Mississippi Valley were able to pay a proportionate part of the expenses of flood control, would it be wise policy on the part of the Federal Government to force them to do this? Contributions from local communities would make them partners of the Government and would entitle the contributors to a voice in the way these moneys jointly contributed might be spent.

We would again be confronted with a score or more of different levee districts each striving to outbuild the other. Rich communities will build stronger than their weaker neighbors. Some communities may not be able to contribute at all, or else may fall behind with their contributions. What, then, will be the attitude of the Federal Government? A chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Would the Federal Government stop work on that levee until those living behind it made their contributions? If that were done, a gap might be left through which the water might rush 500 miles, and overflow those whose levees had been built to standard grade.

One of the greatest problems of the levee system is the proper location of levees. This problem has not only been one of the utmost concern to those whose lands are taken for that purpose, but it has also been the subject of great divergence of engineering opinion. No local authority will ever locate a levee behind a town to be destroyed by the flood. Yet the importance of the proper location of a levee may make this imperative.

President Garfield was right when he said that the control of the Mississippi River is too vast for any State to handle, and too much for any authority other than that of the Nation itself to manage. If this control is too vast for any State to handle, how much more vast will be the difficulty if this control, even in part, were delegated to a score of different levee districts, some rich, some poor, each looking out for its own interests and each dominated more or less by local politics.

Whether the Federal Government insists or does not insist upon the local interests contributing 20 per cent of the cost of building levees on the Mississippi River, it is certain that these overflowed communities are now impoverished and are utterly unable to meet these demands. They have reached the end of their resources. Of the $290,000,000 expended by local interests there is still outstanding a bonded indebtedness of $45,000,000. In addition to this these overflowed lands are heavily bonded for drainage systems, concrete highways, schoolhouses, and other purposes.

Mr. Chairman, commerce decrees, humanity urges, duty impels, common sense dictates, and justice demands that absolute, complete, and entire control of the floods of the Mississippi River and its tributaries be vested solely and alone in the Government of the United States.

As one who was present in the affected territory during the entire period of the flood, I wish in behalf of the people whom I in part represent to express our sincere appreciation of the work accomplished by that great humane organization, the Red Cross, and the kind sympathy of the people from all over the United States which was so freely and so substantially extended during that great disaster.

The Red Cross needs no enconium from me or from anyone else. Its noble work speaks for itself. Its kindly ministrations and its charitable deeds are engraved upon the hearts of millions of its beneficiaries. To the people of the Mississippi Valley in the darkest hour of their history, the Red Cross indeed and in truth was the great mother. God alone knows what would have happened to those hundreds of thousands of poor unfortunates, who utterly destitute were driven from their homes had it not been for the work of the Red Cross and the generous contributions of food and clothing which from all over the United States came into the flood-stricken area.

As long as the memories of the greatest flood disaster in our Nation's history survive, just so long will the people of the Mississippi Valley hold in grateful and affectionate remembrance the magnificent work of the Red Cross, and the unselfish, bountiful generosity of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of the Mississippi Valley do not come before this Congress as suppliants. By their toil and sacrifice they built levees long before the Federal Government contributed one dollar for that purpose. Never recognizing the right to force them to pay for the incidental protection, they might receive from the building of a levee essential to the proper navigation of the greatest artery of trade and commerce in the world, yet they cheerfully and willingly contributed of their means until their resources were exhausted.

I challenge the pages of American history to show where a braver battle was ever waged than the fight made by the citizens of the Mississippi Valley. Interrupted by frequent and repeated inundations, they carried on. Raising their levees higher and higher, building cities and towns, erecting school houses and churches, completing roads and highways, establishing factories, and preparing for cultivation millions of acres of land, they made their part of the country one of the greatest wealth-producing, taxpaying sections of America.

By persistent effort, by tireless perseverance, and by working and striving, and by striving and working, they met and conquered the mighty forces of nature, and it was only when these tremendous forces were aided and supplemented by the hand of man did they at last give up the unequal struggle.

They ask for no subsidies. They make no demand for reparations. They do not ask the Federal Government to restore to them one penny of the $400,000,000 of property destroyed forever by that flood. They do not ask the Federal Government to pay one dollar on the $45,000,000 of levee bonds outstanding. They do not ask the Federal Government for aid to rebuild their demolished homes, nor to restock their depleted farms.

They know that divided effort and divided responsibility can no longer control the flood waters of the mighty Mississippi, but that this great task can be accomplished only by unified effort and unified responsibility. Such effort and such responsibility can be vested only in the Federal Government.

If this is done, if the Federal Government takes charge, if that restless river is controlled, a brave and resolute people, by industry and toil, will rebuild their wrecked and ruined homes, pay off the mortgages on their devastated lands, redeem the bonds for which those lands are pledged, and convert a valley of desolation and ruin into a garden of happiness, prosperity, and contentment. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the President made a great speech in Havana—great in its expression of friendship and good will toward our sister republics, great in its idealism, great in its praise of the principles of self-government and of human liberty. And then, even as he spoke, the newsboys cried on the streets, "Forty Nicaraguans killed by American marines."

The President spoke of friendship and respect for weaker nations and at the same time a bloody war which he has been carrying on for 12 long months, without the consent of the people of the United States, was being waged in Nicaragua. He spoke of chivalry and of kindness and of brotherly love. What a pity that his action does not square with his words. The words were brave, the action is not brave. The words were fine and noble, the action is of tyranny and of oppression.

The newspapers say that he closed his great speech with a scriptural quotation:

> The letter killeth, while the spirit giveth life.

I like to have our Presidents use scriptural texts when it shows their faith in religion. I like for them to show familiarity with the Bible. But I would rather that Presidents and other public men in quoting Holy Writ should stick to something having a relation to their performances, and which finds its expression in deeds, not in empty words. As having a real appositeness and significance I would have commended a text to the President, which he will find in II Samuel, chapter 20, verse 9:

> And Joab said to Amasa, art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.
> But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died.

I would have our rulers not to quote pious texts when they are resolved upon oppressive courses of conduct. I would at least have them to be frank and honest enough to state their real purposes to the world. It is just such exhibitions as that of the President at Habana that are gaining for us the name of being the arch hypocrites of the age.

THE WORLD CALLS US "HYPOCRITE"

To-day the newspapers of the whole world are sneering at the President's speech. Even the British press sneers at his hypocrisy, and, oh, when perfidious Albion may have warrant to sneer at the hypocrisy of another nation surely there is none left so poor to do us "reverence."

I find an editorial in one of my home papers, the Birmingham Age-Herald, which expresses the thought which seems to have come to disinterested observers everywhere. The editorial discusses Mr. Coolidge's Habana speech, and then says:

It is perhaps too much to have anticipated from such a source dynamic counsel or forthright leadership, but Mr. Coolidge might at least have sought to give the impression that he was not talking in a vacuum.

And the editorial writer goes on with what is a real literary gem:

How little the United States has resorted to force, how much we have respected the sovereignty of small nations, how deeply we are attached to the principle of self-government of others, how free we are of delusions and military grandeur, how slow to anger and how merciful we have been, how completely we have clung to the spirit of the law, and how utterly we have sought to promote consideration and good will in our international policy, let Nicaragua prove to the world.

And, I might add, "and let Haiti, let Santo Domingo, let Colombia, and let the Philippines," and so on and on, "prove to the world." It is wicked enough to oppress a smaller nation. The wickedness of doing so is infinitely magnified by the pretense that we are doing no wrong.

WHY WE ARE IN NICARAGUA

What are we doing in Nicaragua, anyway? Why are we there? The people do not know. They ask me, they ask everybody here, why we are in Nicaragua. Unfortunately from no official source does Congress know. Congress has been told little more about the real reasons for being in Nicaragua than have the people of the country.

Our Committee on Foreign Affairs has refused to investigate the subject. They have refused to ask the administration for the true facts. They prefer to servilely submit to the purposes of the State Department.

The President has addressed the subject in his two last messages to Congress, but to the candid mind the conclusion is irresistible that little of the true story has been told. In his message to Congress of January 10, 1927, the President assumed to tell us why he had sent the marines to Nicaragua. I have the message here and have searched carefully through it. I will read the extracts by which in his involved style he related what he desired Congress and the country to believe were his reasons for sending them.

After at some length reciting a situation alleged to have existed in Nicaragua he told us that the Secretary of State had called upon the Secretary of the Navy in these words:

I have the honor to suggest that war vessels of the special service squadron proceed as soon as possible to the Nicaraguan ports of Corinto and Bluefield for the protection of American and foreign lives and property in case that threatened emergencies materialize.

And that naval vessels and marines had been sent accordingly. He also stated that—

During the last two months the Government of the United States has received repeated requests from various American citizens, both directly and through our consuls and legation, for the protection of their lives and property. The Government of the United States has also received requests from the British chargé at Managua and from the Italian ambassador at Washington for the protection of their respective nationals.

He next proceeded to discuss the bonded debt of the Nicaraguan Government, and stated that some millions of dollars of the bonds were held by "American citizens." Who the American bondholders were he did not state, but it is generally believed that they are a certain group of New York bankers.

He also said:

There is no question that if the revolution continues American investments and business interests in Nicaragua will be very seriously affected, if not destroyed. The currency, which is now at par, will be inflated. American as well as foreign bondholders will undoubtedly look to the United States for the protection of their interests.

And later, summing up:

Manifestly the relation of this Government to the Nicaraguan situation, and its policy in the existing emergency, are determined by the facts which I have described. The proprietary rights of the United States in the Nicaraguan canal route, with the necessary implications growing out of it affecting the Panama Canal, together with the obligations flowing from the investments of all classes of our citizens in Nicaragua, place us in a position of peculiar responsibility.

And, finally, the President closed his message with—

The United States can not, therefore, fail to view with deep concern any serious threat to stability and constitutional government in Nicaragua tending toward anarchy and jeopardizing American interests, especially if such state of affairs is contributed to or brought about by outside influences or by any foreign power. It has always been and remains the policy of the United States in such circumstances to take the steps that may be necessary for the preservation and protection of the lives, the property, and the interests of its citizens and of this Government itself. In this respect I propose to follow the path of my predecessors.

Consequently, I have deemed it my duty to use the powers committed to me to insure the adequate protection of all American interests in Nicaragua, whether they be endangered by internal strife or by outside interference in the affairs of that Republic.

Analyzing the President's statement we find that he excuses the sending of our forces into Nicaragua on four grounds: First, the protection of the lives and property of American citizens; second, the protection of British and Italian nationals; third, for the protection of the canal concession; and fourth, to pacify Nicaragua in the interest of American and foreign bondholders.

Now, as to the first of these reasons let it be said that not a single instance of danger to the life of an American citizen has been cited. Not an American civilian has been killed or injured. Not an instance of damage to any physical property owned by Americans has been related. It has been charged recently that there was no danger to American lives or physical property. The administration has been challenged in vain to disclose any such instance. No one now claims that any American civilian has actually been injured nor his property destroyed. We are impelled, therefore, to believe that "life and property," as used by the President, is a euphemism for bonds and evidences of debt.

Also, the facts are quite persuasive that the British and Italian requests for protection were merely perfunctory courtesies, and that none of their nationals were actually in danger.

As to the canal concession, let me say that neither of the Nicaraguan factions disputed it. Neither sought to take it away. We were not in physical possession of any actual ground for the construction of the canal. Its final location has not been considered, and no particular territory set apart. The concession needed no protection. The matter was not involved in the revolution. The President's reference to it was obviously made merely to strengthen a weak case.

INTERVENTION IN THE INTEREST OF BONDHOLDERS

Of all the reasons stated by the President, only one was real, the fourth. Without doubt, the interests of the bondholders were seriously jeopardized. A country torn by revolution is in no shape to meet its interest payments. The pacification of Nicaragua was clearly to the interest of its creditors. There we have the key to the situation. It may be clearly deduced from the President's message, and from such facts as have leaked out through the press, that the real purpose of our marines in Nicaragua is to pacify the country, restore order, and make the bondholders secure in their debts. Our intervention in Nicaragua, and the protectorate which we have established, was to enable American bondholders, and foreign bondholders, if any there be, to receive their interest payments.

Subsequent events have tended to confirm the belief that our Nicaraguan mission is merely that of a bill collector. As soon as Congress adjourned, the international bankers began to reap the fruits of the President's sowing. I read from an Associated Press dispatch of a few weeks ago:

Nicaragua obtained a loan of $1,000,000 in New York last March, for the purpose of retiring certain outstanding obligations. It was equally divided between J. & W. Seligman and the Guaranty Trust Co., and was in the form of a banker's credit. The loan was for one year, at 6 per cent, and the State Department's information is that repayment will be completed by June 1.

The dispatch further states:

The State Department survey of economic and financial conditions in Nicaragua, on which a future policy may be formulated, is being conducted by Dr. William W. Cumberland. Such a survey was proposed by President Diaz with the approval of both Nicaraguan political parties as the starting point for adoption in Nicaragua of a comprehensive financial program. This program would cover not only emergency needs due to the civil war, but also the execution of much-needed public works, such as the railway from the capital to the Atlantic coast.

Negotiation of another loan to Nicaragua by American bankers probably will not await the outcome of a Nicaraguan economic survey now being made for the State Department, although that survey probably will furnish the basis for a department policy toward later borrowings.

Although department officials do not know the exact status of conversations understood to be already in progress in New York, and will make no official comment regarding them, it is known here that Nicaragua may regard it as necessary to arrange without much delay for an emergency advance of $1,000,000 or $1,500,000 to help organization of the national guard and restoration of order.

That dispatch is quite illuminating. Never has been given the name of a single American citizen whose life was in danger in Nicaragua. Repeated efforts have been made to ascertain who they were, and where they were, and what the danger was. The challenge has been issued that there has been none such. The administration, which is possessed of all the facts, though challenged to name them, has not permitted to escape the censorship the statement of a single life or a single dollar's worth of property that has been jeopardized by the Nicaragua revolution.

All that has come out is that conditions down there were unstable and American bondholders were in danger of losing some of their investments unless we stabilized and pacified the country. And the bankers have continued their loans and now they plan new loans all under the guardian eye of our imperialistic Department of State.

In the President's message to Congress of December 6, 1927, we have his latest pronouncement on the Nicaraguan situation. Referring to conditions in China he said:

We have been compelled to send naval and marine forces to China to protect the lives and property of our citizens.

And in the next paragraph he said as to Nicaragua:

We are confronted by similar conditions on a small scale in Nicaragua. Our marine and naval forces protected our citizens and their property and prevented a heavy sacrifice of life and the destruction of that country by a reversion to a state of revolution. Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of War, was sent there to cooperate with our diplomatic and military officers in effecting a settlement between the contending parties. This was done on the assurance that we would cooperate in restoring a state of peace where our rights would be protected by giving our assistance in the conduct of the next presidential election, which occurs in a few months. With this assurance the population returned to their peace-time pursuits, with the exception of some small roving bands of outlaws.

STIMSON IN NICARAGUA

Which is to say that the President sent Mr. Stimson to Nicaragua. Stimson called in Moncada, and possibly others active in the revolution on the Liberal side, and read the riot act to them; told them that they must surrender their arms and equipment and disband, promising them in return that our forces should supervise an election to be held next August, at which the majority should be permitted to choose a President for Nicaragua.

It is rumored that Moncada was also promised that he should be elected as the next president, but it would seem unnecessary to have bribed him with such a promise, as the threat was that if the Liberals did not submit our troops would take the field against them. So that, of course, Moncada had to submit. There was no alternative for him and his associates.

Yes; there was an alternative—the alternative of desperation, the alternative which Sandino chose—to fight on and to die fighting, and in the meantime to be called an "outlaw."

The President claims that by the Stimson strong-arm methods he "prevented a heavy sacrifice of life." American lives? No; Nicaraguan lives, so that they might be able to pay taxes to satisfy the claims of American bondholders. Nicaraguan lives! Yet our marines have been forced to take 1,000 Nicaraguan lives and to wound 2,000 more in pacifying the country and carrying out the Stimson agreement.

The President admits in his last message that the marines are not now required in Nicaragua for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens. He admits that their sole function now is to pacify the country, to keep it quiet and supervise the election. That is why our marines are there. That is what they are doing. The country must be pacified so that the bonds will be paid and so that American bankers may continue to make loans to Nicaragua and be able to collect them with interest.

LETTER FROM FATHER OF SERGEANT HEMPHILL

The reaction of the people of the United States to the situation is fairly expressed in the letter which the father of Sergeant Hemphill, who lost his life in the recent fighting, wrote to the President a few days ago, in which he said:

Mr. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: According to dispatches of to-day (January 3) from Managua, my son, Sergt. John F. Hemphill, was killed in action against General Sandino's loyal troops.

For the death of my son I hold no malice or ill will toward General Sandino or any of his men, for I think (and I believe 90 per cent of our people agree with me) that they are to-day fighting for their liberty as our forefathers fought for our liberty in 1776, and that we as a Nation have no legal or moral right to be murdering those liberty-loving people in a war of aggression. What we are doing is nothing less than murder for the sole purpose of keeping in power a puppet President and acting as a collector for Wall Street, which is certainly against the spirit and letter of our Constitution.

My son was 29 years old, served three years of his third enlistment, survived honorable service through the World War against Germany, only to be officially murdered in a disgraceful war against this little nation.

My father served through the Civil War, my two grandfathers died in action in the same war, and I am proud of their records, so this is not from the pen of a red radical but from one who loves justice and fair play.

I have four sons, and if necessity arose I would be willing to sacrifice not only all four sons but my own life as well in a war of defense, but I am not willing to shed one drop of blood in a war of aggression, such as this one is.

You have lost a son and know the sorrow, and we as a Nation mourned with you in your hour of grief. Suppose that son had fallen, as my son has, a victim to the greed of Wall Street, would you feel that the financial gain was worth the cost?

JOHN S. HEMPHILL.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I have read this agreement entered into between the factions in Nicaragua as negotiated by Mr. Stimson. It provides that the United States shall supervise an election in Nicaragua. It seems to me to be a treaty. I am at a loss to know how the Chief Executive thinks he has a right to put into effect a treaty without its approval by the Senate.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Section 2 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States forbids any agreement binding upon the United States to be made without the consent of the Senate. It requires all treaties and other international agreements to be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent. Under that clause of the Constitution any officer of the United States who assumes to bind the United States by any agreement with a foreign country without the consent of Congress is guilty of usurpation and of a violation of both the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is it not a fact that President Wilson sent a gentleman from Minnesota, by the name of John Lind, to Mexico under somewhat similar circumstances without any confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What does it matter? No doubt there are precedents. Is it possible that usurpation is any less hateful because there have been other usurpations? Does the gentleman take the position that violations of the Constitution may be legalized as a matter of habit and that a usurpation upon the part of one President excuses the usurpation of power upon the part of another? [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that Mr. Lind did not execute an agreement with a sovereign nation to supervise an election in that country.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course, the cases are not parallel. But what does it matter whether they are or not? I have no patience with those partisans who seek to excuse the misconduct of their party associates by charging that a member of the other party has also done wrong. I condemn usurpation whether it be by the President of my party or any other party. I did not fail to condemn the President of my party for exceeding his constitutional powers. I was one of the first to condemn him, and I am sure I will not withhold my condemnation of the immeasurably smaller and weaker man who now happens to occupy the presidential chair. [Laughter and applause.]

The Constitution, as expressed in section 2 of Article II, also requires that the approval of the Senate must be secured by the President to validate all appointments of those who represent us in foreign countries. The President did not have the consent of the Senate to Mr. Stimson's appointment. His nomination was never submitted to the Senate, was never considered, and was never confirmed. By appointing Stimson as his representative to bind the people of the United States the President again violated the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution.

Also, the Constitution as found in section 8 of Article I clothes Congress with the exclusive function of declaring war. In carrying on the war in Nicaragua without the consent of Congress the President is violating the spirit of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is in the bill under consideration an item making appropriations for the Shipping Board and with reference to that item, and the Shipping Board more particularly, I desire to make some comment.

In order that we may refresh our recollection as to the aim and purpose of the merchant marine act of 1920, I want to read an excerpt from the preamble:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce—and it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine—and the United States Shipping Board shall in the administration of the shipping laws keep always in view this purpose and object as the primary end to be attained.

I think that nobody more than myself appreciates the almost insurmountable obstacles which have confronted the Shipping Board in its attempt to follow out the purpose and the spirit of this act. And I desire at the outset to express my appreciation and to convey my congratulations to the board that for the year beginning September 1, 1926, and ending October 31, 1927, under their administration of the American Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation, the number of voyages of our American ships have been increased 23 per cent and the tonnage handled 22 per cent, while the actual operating losses have been reduced 20 per cent.

At this point I should like to read to the House a brief excerpt from the last message of the President:

The Shipping Board is constantly under pressure, to which it often yields, to protect private interests rather than serve the public welfare. Our exporters and importers are both indifferent about using American ships.

I thought it might be well for us to have a concrete instance of what the President was referring to, and the matter is of such significance and perhaps of such importance that I will not trust myself to speak of it in detail except as I quote from the public records of the United States Shipping Board.

On January 6, last, a telephone message came from the Hill requesting some of the commissioners of the Shipping Board to come to the office of the chairman of this subcommittee—the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. WOOD—now in charge of this bill, there to meet certain gentlemen. The commissioners invited to this meeting, or present, at least, were Chairman O'Connor, Commissioner Smith, and Commissioner Plummer. Arriving at the office of Mr. WOOD, the record states, they found awaiting them the following:

Ex-Governor Miller, of New York, general counsel for the United States Steel Corporation; Mr. Thomas, president of the Steel Corporation's Isthmian Line—

A line of ships operated by the United States Steel Corporation in the Indian trade—

Vice President Phillips, of the Bemis Bag Co., and resident Calcutta agent of that company, an American company; Mr. Lilly, of Norton & Lilly Co., shipping agents of Sir John Ellerman's British line of ships; a representative of the American Manufacturing Co.; and one other.

Congressman WOOD stated, so says the record, that he had called this meeting to see if there was any way by which to iron out the difficulties now existing between the Shipping Board, foreign steamship lines, and these other gentlemen in the Calcutta jute-burlap case, and to prevent a rate war, which would be so disastrous to all involved and so expensive to the United States.

Let me say that the Ellerman Lines have been running to Calcutta for some years. The United States Steel Corporation operates a line of ships which make four sailings each year to that port. There is a cargo of some 600,000 tons of jute burlap bags purchased in India by American dealers or importers and shipped out of the port of Calcutta, and the United States Steel Corporation never having increased its sailings above four a year and having made no inroads upon this foreign transportation of American commerce, the Shipping Board, having in mind the spirit of the merchant marine act, which enjoined it upon them to operate fleets of vessels sufficient in number to carry the greater part of American commerce, approached the Ellerman Lines, or the English agent, Lilly, of Norton & Lilly—who, by the way, is also the agent of the United States Steel line, the Isthmian line. They said, in substance:

Now, we have a line of ships coming up through Australia, going on through the Suez into the Mediterranean, and as we come past India we have trouble in getting return cargo. Will you give us one-fourth—not the greater part of the American commerce as the act enjoined it upon them—but they said, "Will you give us the privilege of carrying one-fourth of this American-bought jute burlap bagging and avoid a rate war?" The reply to their overtures was made by Sir John Ellerman, president of the English lines. "This business does not belong to you Americans; we built it up. You keep out of it." In other words, the American Shipping Board was given to understand that they must face a rate war or keep out of the Calcutta trade.

All through these negotiations the Isthmian Line made no attempts to increase its sailings until it was discovered that the United States Shipping Board actually intended to put a line of ships into Calcutta and had asked for 16 out of the 69 sailings from that port each year.

Then these British lines said, "If you will keep out of this Calcutta sea trade we will increase the sailings of the United States Steel ships by 15 sailings (thus giving them a total of 19 sailings a year), and there will then be no rate war." The United States Shipping Board in substance said, "Why permit the Isthmian line to have these sailings and promise no rate war, but threaten us with rate war if the American Shipping Board ships come in with 16 sailings? The Isthmian ships are as much American as are our own ships. Why the discrimination? Again, we ask you to give us the chance to carry one-fourth only of the American commerce from Calcutta to North Atlantic ports. Their answer was, "No; hands off." The English agency of Lilly & Norton still continues to act for the United States Steel Corporation Isthmian Line and the Ellerman English Line.

But the Shipping Board has since established an agency of its own in Calcutta to solicit commerce and shipping. They have started American ships across the seas in pursuance of the spirit of this act and are now competing for American commerce from Calcutta.

They now offer to carry this jute bagging for $4 a ton. But on the morning of January 13, 1928, there appeared the following news item:

[From the New York Herald-Tribune, January 13, 1928]

CUNARD CLOSES JUTE CONTRACT AT $4.50 TON RATE—AGREEMENT CONTAINS SCALE 50 CENTS ABOVE ROOSEVELT'S; BUYERS HOLD BACK IN ANTICIPATION OF FURTHER CUTS

The Cunard Line and members of the Jute and Gunnies Importers' Association recently closed contracts for the first quarter of 1928 on a basis of approximately $4.50 a ton on jute and gunnies moving from Calcutta to Boston and New York.

This rate is 50 cents above that quoted by the Roosevelt Line, Shipping Board operators of the American India Line, which, shortly before the first of the year, slashed the rates from $7.90 to $4 a ton upon failure to reach an amicable agreement with the foreign lines controlling most of the 650,000 tons of bagging material being imported yearly for American firms.

Although the Jute and Gunnies' Association is made up of practically all the American importers of these commodities, it is understood that they voluntarily pay a 50 per cent premium per ton to the Cunard Line over the low rate of $4 quoted by the Shipping Board.

Why this cooperation of American business with foreign shippers to defeat the establishment of an American merchant marine?

Now, the United States Steel Co. has formerly made tentative overture to buy the ships which the Shipping Board contemplated putting into the Indian trade. But the board voted unanimously not to entertain any offers for bids for this line until it was an established line. The reasoning of the board was that if so powerful a corporation as the United States Steel Corporation could not make it profitable to sail more than four times a year into Calcutta, surely no private concerns would make a reasonable bid for ships to compete in that field until a carrying trade in American bottoms had been built up. So they said, "We will continue our sailings." They were right. I commend them for the faithful performance of their duty under the merchant marine act of 1920.

And now on the noon of the day when this Shipping Board was appearing before our subcommittee and asking for the appropriations that meant life or death to it, certain Members are summoned to this private conference to find present this distinguished array of United States Steel representatives, English shipping agents, and American shippers, to whom I have referred, and another proposal that they sell out is made.

Little wonder that the President in his last message referred to pressure brought upon our Shipping Board.

Ex-Governor Miller having stated—that he was the counsel for the United States Steel Corporation, said in substance, that as a result of the "big stick swinging" by the board, the foreign shipping lines had now become more yielding in their attitude and finally had agreed that they would permit the Isthmian Line—

Says the record—

The United States Steel Line—

which heretofore had only been able to maintain four voyages per annum from Calcutta to North Atlantic ports, to have 15 additional sailings, or one less than 16 sailings which the Shipping Board had asked; but that the foreign shipping lines would not permit in this service any sailings by Shipping Board vessels.

The question immediately arose in my mind, what is the relationship between this Isthmian Line owned by the United States Steel Corporation and these British lines, that the British lines will permit them to go into this business, but will not let the Shipping Board, enjoined by the Congress to go forward and establish a merchant marine upon the high seas, have anything to do with this commerce?

Let us follow the report. It reads:

Why foreign shipping men preferred the Isthmian ships to the United States Shipping Board ships was not explained, although commented upon. Ex-Governor Miller said that this rate war would compel the Steel Corporation to take its ships out of this trade because they could not stand the loss that would be involved, and that the effect of a rate war in this trade would extend to their other services, particularly to their Gulf service, and be detrimental as well to their fleet generally.

One of the first suggestions Governor Miller made was that if this rate war continued, instead of allowing their ships to be driven out of the trade the Steel Corporation might find it necessary to bring an injunction restraining the Government from operating ships in that trade. He was thereupon reminded of what the Supreme Court had just decided in the Western Union case, and the chairman remarked that he would be glad to take the matter before the court, the Congress, or the public.

The proposal of Governor Miller that his company should apply for an injunction was undoubtedly based on the philosophy that the Government ought not to be in competition with private interests in trade. We are all agreed that when the Shipping Board shall have established business sufficient to justify sailings enough to carry the major part of our commerce then the ships operated by the Government shall be disposed of and they shall be operated by private interests.

But we should continually bear in mind the preamble of the merchant marine act. We must first establish sufficient lines, establish sufficient business, before we can be assured of a merchant marine sufficient to carry "the greater portion" of our own commerce. Private firms are not going to make attractive bids for our ships until these lines are established, and we do not propose to give ships away as we should have to when only one bidder is interested.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I will. I always yield to my friend, for I know he is interested in the merchant marine.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has made an interesting statement that the House and the country ought to have. Does the gentleman believe in the action of the subcommittee in cutting the Budget figures more than $1,400,000 below the amount approved by the Budget?

Mr. BEEDY. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. I wanted to lead up to that at the close of the remarks that I am making. I want first to cite this instance of pressure on our Shipping Board, to which the President referred in his message, and the indifference of the American shippers to the use of American ships.

Let me continue with this record:

Meeting the declaration that the Shipping Board started the rate war, Chairman O'Connor emphatically advised these gentlemen that the Shipping Board never had started a single rate war, and attention was called to the unyielding attitude of the foreign shippers set forth by the declaration of Sir John Ellorman that the American had no right in this business whatever—that it belonged to the British ships.

Governor Miller insisted that the rate war was started by the Shipping Board, and Mr. Plummer reminded him of the old legal principle that "He who makes it necessary for me to draw my gun is the aggressor."

When he attempted to impress Congressman WOOD with the great losses which this rate war would bring upon Shipping Board vessels Governor Miller was reminded that on the contrary the rate war would be an advantage to the Shipping Board fleet because at present these Shipping Board vessels are coming from the East only partly loaded and that any cargo secured from Calcutta at a rate which more than paid the stevedore and port charges would be a financial benefit.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. By whom were they denied?

Mr. BEEDY. By the English lines.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. At this conference?

Mr. BEEDY. No; this was through correspondence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. BEEDY. The report continues:

Asked by Mr. Wood if this line was not losing money at the present time, he was informed that it was.

It was distinctly pointed out that to offer these vessels for sale before we had made our position in that trade secure and while the foreign shippers and shipping men would permit no American ships excepting those of the Isthmian Line to share in this business through a foreign agent, without a rate war, meant that the only possible purchaser of the line under present conditions would be the Steel Corporation; but if these Americans, who obviously have the power, would let a share of their cargoes be brought to the United States in American flag vessels, the trade could be stabilized and the service be put in a condition to sell within one year; for the rate war would end at once.

As I understand the present situation, when American purchasers of foreign goods attempt to say anything about the method of transporting those goods, it is claimed that the foreign vendors insist that the purchasers have no right to determine the means of transportation, but that they may select the shipping lines. The Shipping Board says, in substance, if that is true, why is it not right that American vendors here do not have the right to say how their goods shall be transported to Europe? What we are asking American importers and purchasers of Indian products to say, says the Shipping Board, is that they want these products or a part of them, one quarter of them, from Calcutta, to be brought in American ships. The report continues:

Two or three times references were made to the fact that these importers who are having the great bulk of their raw material brought into this country in foreign ships are the beneficiaries of our protective tariff; and when at last Mr. Thomas declared there was no connection between the methods of transportation employed by these manufacturers and the protective tariff, Mr. Plummer remarked that there certainly was; that he has been an advocate, on the stump and in the press, of a protective tariff for many years, but if these American manufacturers persisted in having their raw materials delivered to them from foreign vessels, he would demand that he have his linoleums and other similar products delivered from foreign mills; and asked what the answer would be when that proposition went before Congress and the public.

I do not know what your answer would be, but I think that if great industries in this country, which have grown up under the benevolent laws passed by my own party, with a keen desire to develop American industry and to afford employment to American labor, are now unwilling to cooperate with the American Congress to establish a merchant marine on the high seas, I, myself shall look with less sympathy upon their demands for protection from this Congress. [Applause.]

I realize, however, that one must not be carried away by his emotions. I realize that there are millions of laborers to be affected by a denial of tariff protection to industry to-day. If I were sure of the proper course to pursue I would punish every great industry that has benefited by the tariff and that now, because of a selfish desire to sail just enough of its own ships to take care of its own products and thus deny the independent steel producers of this country American ships to take their products into foreign markets—I say I would punish them severely. I now invite the cooperation of the great United States Steel Corporation and other American industries which have profited by the American tariff, even at a temporary sacrifice perchance, to cooperate with the United States Shipping Board, the creature of the American Congress, that we may yet establish on the high seas an American Merchant Marine adequate to the needs of "the major portion" of American commerce. [Applause.]

The report then goes on to say that Chairman WOOD remarked that there seemed to be some feeling between the parties and that they were not accomplishing anything, and that the meeting had better adjourn. And thus ended this meeting which, in my judgment, would have been more properly held in the offices maintained by the Government for the transaction of business with the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. Chairman, in the afternoon succeeding this interview in the office of the chairman of the subcommittee, the Shipping Board again went on with its pleas for funds to carry on. I think the motives of the chairman of the subcommittee that held this conference in his office were of the very highest, but I am going to say to him that I think the officials of the United States Steel Corporation were keen enough to understand that, to say the least, it would be very embarrassing to these commissioners to be dragged into such an interview and be forced to confess that they were entering a line of business that was unprofitable, at 1 o'clock, and then have to come back before this committee at 3 o'clock and ask for money to continue the business.

I think the officials of the United States Steel Corporation were keen enough to understand that it would be a pretty severe test of the stamina and character of the members of the United States Shipping Board to go into that conference and resist their overtures and refuse to sell out for nothing, as it were, to one bidder, and get out of this line of trade in Calcutta, rather than come back and ask for more money to carry on.

The Shipping Board, under the advice of its experts, had asked for $14,500,000 for next year, but the Budget, as it always does, pared them to the bone, and allowed them only $13,688,000. But this subcommittee cut them another million and gave them only $12,000,000. Now, I ought to be explicit about this. The board has an income of $400,000 a year, so that they have $12,400,000 as a shipping fund to operate the fleet.

What is the psychology of a reduction at this time, when the great industries of the Nation, in cooperation with foreign shipping lines, are exercising the pressure that the President refers to, to keep our ships off the seas? What is the psychology of another cut below the Budget recommendation? The foreign shippers are going out to their consumers and saying, "Your Congress evidently intends to put your Shipping Board out of business as fast as it can. There is no other conclusion we can come to about it. It must mean that this American line of ships, now competing with us temporarily, will die after this year. You had better stay with us and give us your shipping."

These American shippers do not want to get in wrong with the foreign shipowners, and that we can demonstrate by our appropriations in this House, unless we intend to stand behind the Shipping Board and maintain our fleets to carry the greater portion of our commerce to foreign ports, we merely give aid and comfort to the enemies of an American merchant marine. [Applause.]

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 6053. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Linden-Lexington road, in Perry and Decatur Counties, Tenn.

The committee resumed its session.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1929

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have introduced to-day two resolutions, both being introduced at the solicitation of constituents in my district, regarding the sale of fertilizer at this time. The information which I have is such that I think at least it very strongly tends to show that the fertilizer corporations of this country are not only unfair to the farmers, but they are actually violating the law with reference to the antitrust provisions now in force. Not only this, but they have, in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of many others who are perhaps in a better position to pass upon the question than I am, been unduly advancing the prices of the commodities they are offering to sell and which they are selling to farmers at this time.

As an illustration, last year the fertilizer concerns in my locality were selling, delivered in my home city, a 9-2-3 grade of fertilizer at $17 per ton f. o. b. that city. This year the companies are selling the same fertilizer at $23.99, an increase in round figures of $7 per ton over the price of last year. They sold last year a 12-4-4 grade of fertilizer at $24 a ton at this point, and they are now selling, and offering to sell at this same point, the same grade of fertilizer at $32.12. It is strange indeed that they sell at the same price and at these unusual figures.

You will observe that this is an increase in price ranging from $7 to more than $8 per ton, and if you will figure the percentage of increase you will see that it is extremely large.

So far as I am aware, or advised, there is no increase in the cost of the commodities composing these fertilizers which would warrant such an increase.

Certainly the condition of the farmers who are using these fertilizers, and who propose to use them, are not such that they are able to pay for the commodities at these advanced prices; and, mind you, these are cash prices. There is no element of risk involved. It is a cash proposition. As a rule our farmers are forced to pay for their fertilizers when they get them or else pay an additional price of something like $8 to $10 a ton for the commodity if they obtain credit.

The press of my State recently carried the statement that the cotton acreage would be increased this year, that the recent cold in that locality and other sections had killed all of our winter grain crops. It is now too late to plant those lands in any similar grain as a crop to be grown in the early spring and summer months. It is too late to plant rye and wheat and oats. Most of the lands were seeded with oats. Realizing that many planters having these lands broken and in many instances already fertilized, some one put out the report that they proposed to put such lands in cotton. Immediately the price of cotton declined, as the press story goes, and the price of fertilizer was increased, the fertilizer companies taking advantage of a misfortune which had overtaken these already oppressed and almost bankrupt farmers in my section. They immediately increased the price of the commodities which they must use in their farm operations.

Not only that, but the prices at which they are selling and the prices given out by the various companies dealing in that section are such, I think, as to convince almost any impartial mind that there is a common understanding among the companies as to what prices they will receive for their commodities. Instead of putting the commodities on the market at the lowest price at which they can furnish them, evidently they are putting them on at the highest price they think the farmers will stand and for which they will be able to raise the cash.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman stated at the outset of his remarks that he thought these fertilizer people were violating our antitrust laws. Can the gentleman call to mind any evidence of a sincere attempt on the part of the present administration to enforce our antitrust laws?

Mr. LARSEN. I regret very much that I am not in possession of information that would benefit the gentleman materially along these lines. I did, however, hear one of the gentlemen over in the other end of the Capitol make a speech a few months ago in which he stated that owing to an investigation which he had procured within the last few years the fertilizer companies had been brought to task and that large fines, in many instances, had been imposed upon them. I do not know just what the amount of the fines were, nor of my own knowledge do I know that fines were imposed. I understand some penalties were imposed either by agreement with the Department of Justice or through the courts in Baltimore. One of the resolutions which I introduced to-day requests information from the Attorney General regarding the matter to which the gentleman from Oklahoma now calls my attention.

I do not know under what administration these offenders were punished or whether or not the administration was at all responsible for their punishment, but I do understand punishment was inflicted. I hope to have that information brought to the attention of the Congress, and to the attention of the people of the United States through the Department of Justice, showing us just what has been done, and not only what the penalties were but so far as possible what offenses, if any, were committed by the fertilizer concerns.

I was about to address my remarks, when I yielded to the gentleman from Oklahoma, to the similarity of prices at which these fertilizer concerns are selling and offer to sell their commodities. For instance, I have here the prices that are quoted by some of the companies doing business in my State. The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Corporation is offering phosphate at $17 a ton. The F. S. Royster Guano Co. offers the same commodity for $16.99, just a differency of 1 penny on a ton. I do not know how they could figure that difference, nor why they so figured it, but they have probably concluded that the best way to manipulate the matter was to make a little immaterial difference and thus avoid the charge of being in a combine. Three other companies offer to sell 16 per cent phosphates at identically the same prices and delivered at the same point, $17.82, the Empire State Chemical Co., at Athens, Ga., $17.82, Ethredge Guano Co., of Atlanta, Ga., and $17.82, the Southern States Phosphate & Fertilizer Co., delivered at the same point.

Now, gentlemen, it is very queer to me that all these companies would have identically the same prices on the same articles delivered at the same point. The circumstances are such as to at least raise the presumption that there is a common understanding between them, that they will sell for the highest price they can possibly get. Not only do they sell for the highest price they can get, but they sell at identically the same price. The quotations of the various companies are so nearly the same there must be a common understanding among them. That common understanding is not for the welfare of the public, and especially farmers who are forced to use fertilizers in the cultivation and growth of their crops.

The farmers in my section, in many instances, mix their own fertilizers. Where they mix fertilizers they usually use phosphate and mix it with potash or some other such commodity. The Empire State Chemical Co., operating at Athens, offers to sell at a given point in Georgia nitrate at $53, while a competitor offers to sell the same commodity at $52.95. But there is a little differential in the haul and in the transportation company over which these articles would be delivered at this same point. So you will see, gentlemen, that when it comes to these commodities that go into the mixtures, where farmers prefer to mix their own fertilizers, the commodities cost them substantially the same amount. When they mix them with cottonseed meal or whatever they propose to use, they find the cost the same. When it comes to the various grades I have mentioned, the prices are identically the same, and the figures I have given are taken from the prices of a half dozen different concerns.

Now, gentlemen, as before stated, I have introduced to-day two resolutions. I am not asking that we appoint any committee in this House to investigate the matter.

I do not want to burden the Senate or the membership of this House with a congressional investigation, nor do I desire to burden the public with such an investigation except through our regular constituted channels. All I want is a department of this Government which has been created for the express purpose to make the investigation and to report its findings—I refer to the Federal Trade Commission. The Federal Trade Commission has the right under the Federal Trade Commission act, section 6, subsection (d), to make this investigation upon direction of the President or either House of Congress and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation. I am simply asking that these resolutions be voted out by the House and that the Federal Trade Commission conduct the investigation and make its report, and that the Department of Justice, which I am referring to in another resolution, advise the House what has been done within the past five years along the lines of the information sought by the gentleman from Oklahoma a few moments ago, and I hope, gentlemen, you will use your influence in seeing that these resolutions are passed. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to take these few minutes to discuss the subject of bridge legislation and to advise the House of the policies that have been adopted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and the Committee on Commerce of the Senate in reference to bridge legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. At this juncture, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is about the best-informed man we have in the House on bridge legislation, and has had charge of such legislation here for several years. Practically all of the Members are interested in the matter and might want to hear him. Does not the gentleman want us to get a quorum here? We now have about 30 Members on the floor. I will make a point of order that will get the gentleman a quorum, if he does not mind it. I would like for more of the Members to hear the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. I appreciate the attitude of my friend from Texas, but I would rather go ahead.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me make the point and call them in from the cloakrooms and then I will withdraw it. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DENISON. I do not want to take up the time of the committee for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes a point of order that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Now that the Chair has counted and the Members have come in, I withdraw the point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DENISON. At one time or another almost every Member of the House and of the Senate is called upon to introduce bills for the consent of the Congress for the construction of a bridge over some navigable waterway. It is a matter that has become of very great importance not only to the House but to the country.

At the last Congress I discussed at some length the question of bridge legislation and the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over our navigable waterways. My remarks can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 30, 1926. I do not want to go into the details of that subject again at this time. I simply will make the following general statement:

Jurisdiction over the waterways of the country in England was in the Crown for the purposes of commerce. All navigable waterways were considered as belonging to the Crown. When the Colonies in this country were settled jurisdiction over the navigable waterways of this country was also in the Crown of England. At that time it was held that such jurisdiction extended up the rivers as far as the tidewaters reached; but in the course of time, by analogy the jurisdiction of the Crown was held by the courts to extend up the waters of the various rivers and the arms of the sea as far as they were navigable.

When the Colonies won their independence from Great Britain this jurisdiction passed to the various Colonies; and when the Colonies got together in the Constitutional Convention and the Constitution was adopted the commerce clause was inserted in it by which the Federal Government was given the right to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. In other words, by the commerce clause of the Constitution the States surrendered their jurisdiction over all navigable waterways to the Federal Government, and since then the Federal Government has had absolute and exclusive jurisdiction over all the navigable waterways of this country.

Until the Federal Government chose to exercise such jurisdiction in a regulatory way it was considered that the different States had concurrent jurisdiction over those waterways within their respective boundaries, subject to be changed at any time whenever the Federal Government chose to act.

Mr. MORROW rose.

Mr. DENISON. I will yield to my friend from New Mexico.

Mr. MORROW. Have not the Federal courts held that such jurisdiction upon navigable waters and streams also extends to the tributaries with respect to the question of commerce and also for impounding waters that can be used for other purposes?

Mr. DENISON. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois state right there what is the latest, acceptable definition of a navigable stream?

Mr. DENISON. The question of what constitutes a navigable waterway is one of law and of fact; but wherever the history of the stream shows that it at one time or another has been used for commerce, for the transportation of persons or property, it is a navigable waterway. For instance, if it was used in the early days by the pioneers as a highway for moving property, logs, or other property, or for transporting persons, it is classed as a navigable waterway, although, as a matter of fact, it may not now be navigable at all.

But we all know that in the early days before there were highways and before there were railroads the rivers of the country were the only substantial method of transportation in the inland country; and so the courts hold now that all those streams that were at some time used for transportation of persons or property may be classed as navigable waterways and the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction over them.

Mr. BLANTON. And what about potential navigability?

Mr. DENISON. They are not classed as navigable waterways unless at some time in their history they were used for that purpose. It does not matter that they are not now used for navigation or that they are not in their present state capable of being used for navigation; but if they have at some time been used as a highway for transportation they are classed now as navigable waterways.

In 1890 the Congress chose to assert its jurisdiction and to exclude the right of the States to construct or permit to be constructed buildings or bridges or other obstructions in the navigable waterways of the country; and then later in the act of March 3, 1899, the Congress, in section 9 thereof, enacted this provision:

> That it shall not be lawful to construct or commence the construction of any bridge, dam, dike, or causeway over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other navigable water of the United States until the consent of Congress to the building of such structure shall have been obtained and until the plans for the same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War.

Now, by that act the Federal Government through Congress asserted its jurisdiction and declared its exclusive jurisdiction over all navigable waterways of the country.

On March 23, 1906, Congress passed what is known as the general bridge law governing the construction of bridges over navigable waterways. This, in brief, is the principle and generally accepted source of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over navigable waterways, and it is a very great and far-reaching power that was surrendered by the States to the Federal Government.

Let me here digress just a moment to call to the attention of the House another source of jurisdiction by which the Federal Government is now recognized as having the right to regulate the construction of bridges and the collection of tolls that are charged for the use of bridges. Having jurisdiction over the navigable waterways of the country, the Federal Government, in granting franchises for the construction of bridges over them, may grant or withhold the privilege as it pleases; and in granting the privilege it may impose such reasonable conditions as it chooses. In the exercise of this power, the Federal Government can impose such conditions with reference to the construction of the bridges and their management and the collection of tolls for their use as it chooses.

But on July 11, 1916, Congress passed the first Federal aid road act, and since then has passed several other Federal aid road acts, under which the Federal Government has contributed several hundred million dollars to the States to aid in the construction of improved roads for the transportation of interstate commerce and for facilitating the movement of the mails, and for military purposes. With the improvement of roads and the development of motor transportation on the highways, most of the highways of the country have come to be used as channels for the transportation of interstate commerce, and to this extent the States have lost their exclusive right to regulate them and the Federal Government has acquired certain rights in connection with the highways whenever it chooses to exercise its powers.

In Indiana a drainage district organized under the laws of that State undertook to cut a drainage ditch across the Lincoln Highway, which it had the right to do under a State law, without making provision for repairing the highway with a permanent bridge. The Federal Government went into a United States court and asked for an injunction to prevent the drainage district from tearing up the highway. The injunction was granted, and the case was appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where the decision of the lower court was affirmed. In the course of its opinion the court said (U. S. v. Babcock, 6 Fed. Rep. 161):

> The Government of the United States is one having jurisdiction over every foot of soil within its territory, and acting directly upon each citizen, * * * to which is committed power over interstate commerce and the transmission of the mail. The powers thus conferred upon the National Government are not dormant, but have been assumed and put into practical exercise by the legislation of Congress. In the exercise of those powers it is competent for the Nation to remove all obstructions upon highways, natural or artificial, to the passage of interstate commerce or the carrying of the mail. It is said that the jurisdiction heretofore exercised by the National Government over highways has been in respect to waterways, the natural highways of the country, and not over artificial highways, such as railroads; * * * but the basis upon which rests its jurisdiction over artificial highways is the same as that which supports it over the natural highways. Both spring from the power to regulate commerce.
> If this principle is true as to artificial highways such as railroads, why is it not likewise true as to artificial highways such as the national highway known as Lincoln Highway, which is recognized as a primary interstate highway and upon which the Government has expended many thousands of dollars?

In the case of Duke v. The Michigan Commission (266 U. S. 570) the court held that a statute of the State of Michigan which authorized its public-utilities commission to require persons using its highways for the transportation of interstate commerce to obtain a certificate as a common carrier was unconstitutional, the court saying:

> But it is well settled that a State has no power to fetter the right to carry on interstate commerce within its borders by the imposition of conditions or regulations which are unnecessary and pass beyond the bounds of what is reasonable and suitable for the proper exercise of its power in the field that belongs to it.

In Buck v. Kuykendall (267 U. S. 307) the court held that a statute of the State of Washington which required persons using the highways of that State for the transportation of interstate commerce to obtain a certificate of convenience and necessity before doing so was unconstitutional and void when applied to persons engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce. In the decision the court held that such a statute defeats the purpose of Congress expressed in the legislation giving Federal aid for the construction of interstate highways. In Bush Co. v. Malloy (267 U. S. 317) the court held that a Maryland statute requiring persons engaged in interstate commerce to obtain a certificate of convenience and necessity before using the highways of the State was unconstitutional and void.

These decisions show the trend of the courts in recognizing the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the highways of the different States that are now used for the transportation of interstate commerce and United States mails. And as a result of this additional source of jurisdiction the Federal Government can, when it chooses, regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waterways that are constructed as connecting links on Federal-aid highways or other highways of the States that are used for the transportation of interstate commerce and the United States mails.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and Committee on Commerce of the Senate are the committees that, under the rules, have jurisdiction of this subject. It may not always be a pleasant duty to perform, but it is the duty of these committees to consider all bridge legislation. If bills are filed for the consent of Congress to construct a bridge over a navigable waterway, it is the duty of this committee to consider it and report it, or refuse to report it, to the House. Until the time comes when the question shall be sufficiently settled in the public mind that Congress can know what provisions ought to be enacted into a general law, so that we can wisely pass new general legislation covering all questions connected with the construction of bridges, we will have to continue the policy of considering and passing individual bridge bills as they are presented by the Members.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. COLTON. Referring back to the navigability of streams, has the gentleman found any rule determining the exact meaning of navigability?

Mr. DENISON. There is no standard—it depends on the facts and circumstances disclosed in each case. The Supreme Court has held that the question as to whether or not this river or that river shall be considered a navigable waterway depends on the history of the river and the use that has been made of it for travel and transportation.

Now, this question of bridge legislation was a very few years ago considered of little importance. In fact, four or five years ago we only had one form for all bridge bills—just a short consent statute permitting the bridge to be built. In fact, no bridges were built except railroad bridges and now and then a municipal bridge in some city or a town.

But with the great change in methods of transportation, with the development of improved highways and motor transportation, this question of the construction of bridges has, within the last few years, grown to be of very great importance to the country. Therefore, your committee has had to give a great deal of study to the provisions that should be included in the franchises that Congress grants for the construction of bridges.

Now, I want to discuss for the information of the House and the country the policies that govern your committee in the preparation of the forms that these franchises should take.

In the first place, let me say that the committee wishes to encourage the construction of free bridges wherever they can be built. Of course, we all understand that there are what are known as free bridges, where no charge is made for their use, and there are toll bridges, where a toll is charged.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is favoring and encouraging the construction of free bridges wherever they can be built. That is the first policy of the committee.

In the next place we do not grant any exclusive right to private individuals or private companies to construct toll bridges. I could go into that question in detail and discuss it at great length if I had time. I think it ought to be apparent to every one of us why it would not be wise for Congress to grant to private individuals or to private corporations exclusive rights or monopolies for constructing bridges over navigable waters at particular places. If we should do that, if we should undertake to decide between various parties asking for the right to build a bridge over a river at a particular place, and if we should grant the right to one and refuse to grant it to another—as soon as it was granted it might immediately become maybe of great value and might become an object of traffic and speculation among unscrupulous promoters.

We want the country to understand that no one need pay any promoter a single dollar for a bridge franchise, because he can always come to Congress and get one for nothing.

We do not want to follow any policy which will place a commercial value on bridge franchises, that will result in trading them after they are granted, and which would encourage attempts to use improper methods to obtain them.

The only way you can avoid that is to let the public know that Congress will not grant any monopoly, any exclusive right to construct bridges over any of the rivers or other navigable waters of the country. When we grant such a franchise to an individual he knows and the public knows that if any other responsible party comes to Congress and asks for a franchise to build a bridge near the same place, Congress will freely grant him the right to do so.

There is one exception to this rule: If the public asks for the privilege of building a bridge at a certain location and if some private individual also asks for the right to do so, we give preference to the public as a matter of course.

In other words, if a State wants to build a bridge, or if a city or a county is asking for a franchise to build a bridge, we give preference to public authorities; and when we grant authority to the public to build a bridge at a particular place, we will not grant a similar right to any private individual or corporation. With that exception, we grant no exclusive right and I am sure the Members of the House, when they reflect upon this, will understand and approve the wisdom of that policy.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What has been and what is now the policy of the committee when there are two bills seeking to secure a permit between two points?

Mr. DENISON. If one of the bills is filed asking for the consent of Congress to a public authority like a city or a State or a highway commission, and the other is to a private company or individual, we give preference to the public authority.

If the permits are asked for by two private individuals, and Members of the House or of the Senate come before us and upon their responsibility recommend the granting of the permits, it is the policy of our committees to grant them both and then let the business judgment and the business ability of the two individuals or two groups of individuals and public sentiment determine who shall build the bridge. So far as the Federal Government is concerned, it is entirely satisfactory if they build two bridges. It is a matter of business that must determine how many bridges shall be built and who shall build them. We could not safely follow any other policy.

We can not and will not give an exclusive privilege or monopoly to private individuals to construct toll bridges, and if two or more people obtain permits to build bridges at or near the same place, the one who has the business ability and the money and public sentiment back of him is going to build it, and he is not going to let anybody else scare him out of it. It is the same principle that governs in other business matters. Congress does not attempt to limit the right to some one or another group to build a hotel or an apartment building on one of the streets of our city. That is a business matter, and anyone who wants to can build such a structure. In the construction of bridges we do not want to say that any particular individual shall be given an exclusive right to construct a toll bridge at an important river crossing.

We will grant him the permit to do it, and then if he has the money and the ability and if public sentiment is back of him, he will build it, and he will not let anyone else scare him out of it by a mere threat to build another bridge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman's committee ever given consideration to the question of conferring upon the War Department, without investigation by the Congress of all of these particular bills, a general blanket authority to issue permits to individuals or other associations or highway commissioners the right to construct bridges across navigable streams?

Mr. DENISON. Of course, our committee has given very careful consideration to that subject.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The reason I ask that is that the passage of these bridge bills is largely a matter of legislative mechanics. It takes up a good deal of time of the committee and on the calendar. I would like to hear the gentleman's observations on that phase of the matter if he has given it any consideration.

Mr. DENISON. As I just stated, Congress has exclusive jurisdiction of this important subject. Of course, we can delegate that authority to some bureau or some official of the Government, if we are willing to surrender our control over the subject. That is a question for the wisdom of Congress. Bills are now pending for that purpose. I myself during the last Congress filed a bill to get rid of this whole subject. My committee at one time thought we would like to get rid of it, that the Congress ought to get rid of it and delegate the whole subject to some bureau or some official of the Government. We have already delegated to the War Department the right to pass upon the plans and specifications of bridges, and before any bridge can be built, the plans and specifications must be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War; but the more I have studied the subject, the more doubt I have as to the wisdom of delegating our jurisdiction to control the subject to any bureau or any official of the executive departments of the Government. There might be danger of abuse; there might be danger that the agency to whom we delegate the authority would give exclusive or monopolistic privileges, and there are other dangers it is not necessary to go into.

I have not yet come to the conclusion that it would be wise for the Congress to surrender this important jurisdiction and delegate it to some one individual or some bureau of the Government. We may have to do it sooner or later. There is legislation now pending for that purpose. My colleague on the committee, Mr. BURTNESS, has a very good bill which provides for that policy, now pending before the committee. But before we can do that it is the duty of Congress to lay down the principles which shall govern the bureau or other official in the exercise of such a duty and to provide by general legislation the principles which shall govern in the exercise of that duty.

We are now in a transitory period in the construction of bridges, where we have not been able yet to reach an entire agreement on the question of policy. As soon as we have done that, have reached a general agreement about policies, we can then perhaps pass general legislation covering the whole subject and delegate the authority to some agency of the Government to grant all bridge franchises.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no greater or more important committee, in my opinion, than the committee to which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois belongs, and I hope it will never bring in legislation delegating the power of Congress to any bureau in that way.

Now, leading out from Wichita Falls, between Texas and Oklahoma there are two highways leading to toll bridges, and elsewhere between Oklahoma and Texas you find highways leading to toll bridges and toll ferries. There is one leading out of Dallas, and when you pass Denison and get to the Oklahoma line you have a toll bridge to cross or else you would have to cross on a toll ferry, and I could mention others between Texas and Oklahoma where you have a lot of toll bridges to cross. When you go out of Texarkana on the main highway northeast you soon strike the same proposition. I hope the gentleman's committee will act cooperatively with the Committee on Agriculture, which handles the good roads proposition, and see to it that on all these main highways that connect States steps shall be taken to provide free bridges. They are just as much needed segments of the highways as any other portion of the highways.

Mr. DENISON. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that it is the policy of our committee to favor free bridges wherever possible. But, gentlemen, there are places where free bridges can not be constructed and where they will not be constructed. Let us take as an illustration bridges over the Mississippi River between Illinois and Iowa and between Kentucky and Missouri, and so forth. Those are not State bridges. They are interstate bridges. The Federal Government is not going to build those interstate bridges. It costs from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000 to build one of them. We are aiding the States in constructing good roads in a limited way now, but it will bankrupt this Government if we ever enter upon the policy of building interstate bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. Yet the finest free interstate bridge in the country is that between St. Louis and East St. Louis, across the Mississippi River.

Mr. DENISON. Yes. The city of St. Louis is taxing its people to pay for a free municipal bridge as a municipal investment. It has been a good investment to the city of St. Louis. But there are not many cities that can do what the city of St. Louis did.

Mr. BLANTON. Take, for instance, the section of highways in both Texas and Oklahoma, where the Government matches dollar for dollar with the States. If the Government put up dollar for dollar with Texas and with Oklahoma in that way for bridges, many of the States would be in favor of free bridges and would vote money to match dollars with the Federal Government.

Mr. DENISON. No; I think it would be just the opposite. The people of Cairo, in my district, wanted to get a bridge across the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. I was asked to come to Congress and ask for a Government appropriation for that purpose. I filed such a bill in two Congresses and urged it as strongly as I could, but I did not get even a smile from anyone representing the Federal Government to approve such a policy. Why? The moment the Federal Government enters upon the policy of constructing interstate bridges it will be sure to cost the Government billions of dollars. There are many great waterways in this country, and Congress has not yet reached the point where we are ready and willing to enter upon that kind of a policy. Since the Federal Government is not willing to enter upon the policy of building these expensive free bridges, and so long as there is no prospect of the States doing it, we may properly, I think, permit private capital to build toll bridges.

Mr. BLANTON. As one of the economists of the House, I am ready to vote for a measure that will have the Federal Government match dollar for dollar with the States of Texas and Oklahoma and with all other States similarly situated, to build free bridges as needed segments of interstate highways. If those bills are ever brought on the floor of the House I think the House will favor them.

Mr. DENISON. I have tried that; at the same time that I filed a bill here asking for aid of the Federal Government to construct bridges across the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers at Cairo I made inquiries from time to time of the Highway Departments of the State of Illinois, the State of Kentucky, and the State of Missouri to see if they would join with the Federal Government and appropriate funds to construct free highway bridges over those rivers at Cairo. I received no encouragement. Those States had no funds to use for that purpose. They were all using all they could raise for the construction of improved roads within their respective borders. They were unwilling to levy taxes upon their people to raise funds to construct expensive free bridges to cross the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. So it is the judgment of your committee that the time has not yet come when States will, by general taxation, raise funds to construct free bridges over the interstate rivers along their borders. When all of the improved highways that are needed are constructed, and when the people of the States are willing to be taxed to build bridges over the great rivers of the country, we may then expect free State-owned bridges. But until that time comes, we will have to depend upon private capital to build such improvements whenever public sentiment demands them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there not now a tendency for the States and subdivisions of States to finance the construction of bridges by issuing bonds? Is not that the modern method?

Mr. DENISON. There has been an attempt to do that in a few cases. There are some of them now trying to do it, by asking Congress to confer authority upon them to borrow money, when they have no such authority under their State law. The committee has given very careful attention to this subject, and we feel that there are places in this country where the people need the bridges and where the public authorities can not or will not raise the funds necessary to construct them. Until that can be done by the public authorities we feel that franchises should be granted to private individuals to build the bridges with private capital. And let me say this: There is some sound argument in favor of such a policy.

If we are to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Cairo, for instance, the farmers and business men who live in the upper part of the State will probably never see that bridge and never use it; and there are those who believe that it would not be right to tax all the people of the State several million dollars to enable tourists and others to cross the river at Cairo on a bridge instead of a ferry.

There are a great many people who believe that the people who use bridges should pay for them instead of taxing the people generally for that purpose. Why should the farmers of the State of Illinois be taxed to build a free bridge across the Mississippi River? And why should the people of south Texas and all over the State of Texas and the people of the State of Oklahoma be taxed to build a free bridge, or several free bridges, between the two States? Why not let the tourists and the people who use those bridges pay for them, amortize their cost, and then make them free?

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will yield, there are thousands of Texans who every year cross that free bridge over the Mississippi into East St. Louis. There are thousands of them every year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to leave that subject before I complete it. The policy of our committee is that when we grant the right to an individual or to a corporation to build a bridge with private capital, we protect the interests of the public in various ways. How do we do it? I want to go over that subject briefly.

In the first place, you understand that the Federal Government can regulate the tolls that may be charged. There is never one of these bridges built except at a place where there is a ferry and there is nobody who can regulate the ferry charges. A ferry is an old, antiquated, and unsafe method of crossing rivers, and there is no authority to regulate the tolls that are charged on an interstate stream. On the contrary, when a bridge is built, the tolls can be regulated by the Federal Government; and if the company or individual that builds the bridge charges tolls that are unfair, that are too high or unreasonable, anyone can make complaint to the proper Federal authority, an investigation will be made, and the Federal Government has the right to reduce the tolls. So the tolls charged on such bridges are subject to Federal regulation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. By whom and how?

Mr. DENISON. I will show the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is, by whom? What officials or what group of officials?

Mr. DENISON. The act of March 23, 1906, contains this provision, and every bridge in the United States over a navigable waterway that has been built by the consent of Congress since March 23, 1906, is subject to this provision of law.

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Are not the bridges built prior to that time under the regulation of the Federal Government?

Mr. DENISON. Not if they were built before March 23, 1906. Here is the provision in the act of March 23, 1906, under which the Secretary of War may regulate the tolls that are charged on any toll bridge constructed under that act:

> If tolls shall be charged for the transit over any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act, of engines, cars, street cars, wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, foot passengers, or other passengers, such tolls shall be reasonable and just, and the Secretary of War may, at any time, and from time to time, prescribe the reasonable rates of toll for such transit over such bridge, and the rates so prescribed shall be the legal rates and shall be the rates demanded and received for such transit.

So nobody should be afraid of the charges that will be made on a toll bridge, because at any time the tolls become unreasonable or the public feels that the tolls are too high complaint can be made to the Secretary of War, and he will have an investigation made immediately. He has informed us time and again that that is his policy, and it is the policy he carries out. He will have an investigation made as to the expense of operating the bridge and its cost. After doing that he will fix the tolls at what will be reasonable and just, and they can not thereafter charge any larger tolls than he fixes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In my State of Kentucky, on the eastern Dixie Highway and on the southern Dixie Highway—two transcontinental highways that extend entirely across the country—there are two bridges. One of them, I understand, cost $16,000, and last year the returns from tolls amounted to $126,000. Now, the Federal Government has spent millions of dollars in bringing business to that bridge, and I want to know how you can reach fellows of that kind.

Mr. DENISON. I will tell the gentleman. That is a typical case and a great many of the Members do not understand situations like that. Let me tell you how to handle that situation. If that bridge has been built by the consent of Congress since March 23, 1906, and it is over a navigable waterway of the United States, I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to file a complaint with the Secretary of War, or have anyone else do it, and call his attention to the fact that they are charging unreasonable tolls to cross that bridge, and I will guarantee you will get a reduction in the tolls if they are found to be unjust or unreasonable.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But suppose that bridge was built before March 23, 1906. The Federal Government has built roads to each of these bridges which bring business to them, and I want to know how we are going to reach them?

Mr. DENISON. I will tell the gentleman how to do that. If the bridge was built way back yonder before there was any regulation of these matters, there may be certain vested rights which we have to accept; but I advise the State of Kentucky to take $16,000 more and build a free bridge right by the side of that one, and that will stop it. Congress will grant the State or county a franchise for that purpose any day.

Mr. BLANTON. May I correct one statement which the gentleman inadvertently made?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; if I made one.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will investigate, he will find that in the case of every ferry that is on an interstate highway connecting two States the War Department does assume control over it. It controls its rates, it controls the number of trips it makes per day, it controls the time it must begin these trips, and the time it must stop.

Mr. DENISON. My friend from Texas is usually pretty accurate——

Mr. BLANTON. I checked that up this past summer and I had the owners of such ferries to tell me that the War Department does control them and does cause them to give certain service; for instance, I recall a ferry down in Missouri, particularly, that was caused to make more trips and to reduce its charges.

Mr. DENISON. I can not yield any further. I will state that if the gentleman will point out the law under which the War Department regulates the tolls on ferries, I will be pleased to have him do so. I do not think there is such a law.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the department does it, under the law that gives the Government control over navigable streams.

Mr. DENISON. I want the gentleman to point out the law to me by which they do it. The Department of Commerce regulates the navigation of all rivers and requires certain things as to service, but they do not control the tolls that are charged, as I understand it.

Mr. BLANTON. The War Department assumes control under the general law.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Is that the only remedy the gentlemen of the committee have thought of that is within the law—to build a new bridge right by the side of the old one which is charging excessive tolls?

Mr. DENISON. Would not that be an effective remedy?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That would be an effective remedy, perhaps.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman understands if that bridge was lawfully built with private capital, we can not confiscate it; and if it was built before there was any such law as the present one, we can not regulate its tolls.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It seems to me when the Federal Government has spent $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 to bring the business to that bridge, when it did not have any business practically at all until the Government spent that money, we ought to be able to take hold of it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman from Kentucky can figure out any legal remedy under the Constitution I will be glad to have him do so and insert it in the RECORD. I am trying to state what I think is the law; and I will say if that bridge was built by the consent of Congress, Congress has no doubt reserved the right to repeal, alter, or amend the law granting it; and if that bridge was built by the consent of Congress, my friend the gentleman from Kentucky can file a bill to repeal it and, if the bill can be passed, the Secretary of War will make them tear down the bridge; and he can make them do that at their own expense under the law.

Mr. BLANTON. And what is to prevent us from condemning it under the power of eminent domain as a needed national-highway proposition?

Mr. DENISON. There is nothing to prevent us from condemning it if there is any sufficient Federal reason for doing so.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what we ought to do. We ought to exercise the right of eminent domain.

Mr. DENISON. I suggest to the gentleman that he start proceedings for that purpose if he wants to.

I want now to go ahead and continue my discussion briefly of the policies of our committee in granting these franchises to protect the interests of the public.

First. I said we can regulate the tolls and fix them, if necessary, to make them reasonable and just.

Second. We put in every bill that we pass a provision giving the right of recapture to the public. In other words, we give to the Federal Government or to the State government or any political subdivision with which the bridge is connected the right to go into court and condemn the bridge and take it over for the purpose of making it free.

Then we limit the amount that has to be paid, after a certain time, in order to do this; we provide that if the State government wants to take over the bridge after a certain time it can do so without having to pay for any going value, or any prospective profits, or any earning power, but it can take it over by paying the actual value of the physical structure, less deterioration.

This fully protects the public, so that if at any time the States or the municipalities get into a condition where they can financially do so, they can go into court by proper condemnation proceedings and take over the bridge if they want to make it a free bridge.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ELLIOTT). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Now, in addition to this right of recapture which fully protects the public, we think, we require the person who builds a toll bridge or the company that builds a toll bridge to file a sworn, itemized statement of every element of cost that enters into it. They have to file this statement with the Secretary of War as soon as they complete the bridge, and we are now requiring them to file the statement of costs with the highway department of the State in which the bridge is located; and if it connects two States, they have to file the statement of costs with the highway departments of the two States.

Then we provide that at any time within three years after the completion of the bridge the Secretary of War may make an investigation of this statement of costs; we further provide that upon the request of the highway department of either of the States, the Secretary of War shall make a full inquiry and investigation of the statement of costs, and then it is his duty to find what is the reasonable cost of the bridge—not only the actual cost but the reasonable cost—and whatever he determines to be the reasonable cost is the cost that shall govern in case the public decides to take the bridge over by condemnation. We fix the measure of damages as based upon the cost of the bridge, so that we protect the public against padding of costs, against exaggeration of costs, and against any fraudulent statement of costs.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ARENTZ. Has the gentleman ever had brought to his attention by the Panamanians the question of building a bridge over the Panama Canal?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I have.

Mr. ARENTZ. What does the gentleman think about it?

Mr. DENISON. A bridge over the Panama Canal is a very serious question. It involves questions of national defense that are very important.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman knows that there is a place called Bouquet?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. When Lindbergh wanted to go there the only way he could go was to either fly or go by boat. It seems to me that it would only be fair play to meet the demands of transportation to give them a bridge so that they might cross from the northern part to the southern part of their country.

Mr. DENISON. We have a splendid ferry service there now that answers all present needs of the people. We may some time find a safe way to build a bridge over the canal.

Now, let me go a little further as to the protection of the public against what some think may be an imposition by private toll-bridge owners.

If an individual or company has been given the consent of Congress to build a toll bridge, we have the right to regulate the tolls to be charged the public at any time; and if the public does not want to go ahead and buy the bridge in order to make it free, Congress stands ready at any time to give the public a franchise to build another bridge by the side of it.

We are not only putting all these provisions to protect the public in every franchise we grant to build toll bridges, but in every bridge bill Congress reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend it at any time. The Government can compel the owners of any bridge to change it, or remove it if it interferes with or obstructs navigation.

So, the Federal Government reserves full control over the subject, and under the policy which the committee has adopted in granting these franchises we have taken every possible precaution to protect the public; and we only grant franchises to private individuals when there does not seem to be any probability of a bridge being built by the public authorities.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman believe that the provision reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal is sufficiently broad to justify granting another permit alongside of the one already built?

Mr. DENISON. I do. Congress has absolute control over it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has it ever been tested?

Mr. DENISON. The right to do it has never been questioned.

Now, let me state in conclusion. There are many cases where the States themselves can not build free bridges; they can not or will not tax their people to build expensive bridges over the rivers, especially those on their borders. They are using all the money they can get to improve their roads. It may be long years before many of the States can raise funds to pay for the free highway bridges over interstate waterways. There is ample capital in this country that is now ready to be invested in improved bridges. Your committee sees no reason why, under such circumstances, private capital should not be allowed to be invested in order to give the people better and more modern methods of crossing the rivers of the country.

I have seen statements in the newspapers within the last few days to the effect that American citizens invested last year $2,000,193,000 in foreign countries. In other words, that vast amount of American capital has sought investment abroad for a lack of opportunities for investment in this country. Much of it, no doubt, was invested for the purpose of providing public utilities and for other progressive developments in those countries. Some of us think that it would not be at all unwise to permit some of this capital to be invested in improved methods of crossing the rivers of this country, provided that in permitting it to be done, we prevent the public from being exploited and we preserve to the public the right to regulate the charges for the use of such bridges and save to the public the right to recapture them for the purpose of making them free.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANLOVE. I want to state that I have had four cases before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in presenting municipal bills for different counties in my district, and that I am personally much obliged to the chairman and the committee for the active and expeditious manner in which the business has been transacted.

Mr. DENISON. That is very kind of the gentleman. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. The suggestion I had in mind was the fact that the American investment of $2,000,000,000 and more in Europe annually is probably responsible for all of the sentiment we hear expressed about canceling the debts of foreign nations to the United States.

Mr. DENISON. And it would not be a bad policy to encourage the investment of that American capital at home.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. The gentleman has expressed the conviction that the Federal Government is invested with exclusive jurisdiction over the navigable waters of the United States, that power coming under the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution. As a corollary of that conviction, does the gentleman hold that there is an exclusive obligation upon the part of the Federal Government to control the waters of navigable waterways so as to prevent floods?

Mr. DENISON. I just spoke for an hour and a half before the Flood Control Committee to-day, and I expressed my views that it is the duty of the Federal Government to protect the people of the Mississippi Valley from floods, and that the Federal Government ought to do so from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. If there be exclusive obligation upon the part of the Federal Government, has the Congress the legal right to impose upon the States and compel them to accept a division of that jurisdiction?

Mr. DENISON. That is going into another question which I am sorry I will not have time to discuss now. I will say I do not think the Government can compel the States to pay any part of the expense required for flood control.

In conclusion, the committee has prepared a series of standard forms for bridge bills. They are, we believe, improvements over the forms used heretofore. There is an agreement between the committees of the Senate and the House upon these forms. All of these provisions to protect the public interests are inserted in these forms. I shall insert them, with the consent of the committee, in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and they will, no doubt, be made a public document, so that each Member of the House and the Senate can have them; and if in preparing bills for bridge franchises over rivers in their respective districts, the Members will consult the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and follow the form that fits the facts in the particular case, the bill will meet the approval of the House and the Senate committees, and so far as those two committees can control the matter, will receive the approval of the House and the Senate.

Those forms proposed for bridge bills are as follows:

(Form to extend the times for constructing a bridge)

A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the _____ River, at or near _____.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the ____ River, at or near _____, authorized to be built by _____, by the act of Congress approved ____ are hereby extended one and three years respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] should not only receive the congratulations of the House upon his splendid work with reference to bridge legislation but that he should receive the commendation of the country. I feel certain that when the recapture clause which he initiated in bridge legislation comes to be known and understood by the people of the country and benefits of its provision secured by the public he will receive the plaudits of the country for that pioneer work.

The independent offices appropriation bill for 1929 (H. R. 9481) has been laid before the Congress for its consideration. This bill, carrying appropriations for 26 independent agencies of this Government, would appropriate $526,193,111 toward their maintenance for the fiscal year of 1929. The agencies of government involved are as follows:

Executive.	Federal Power Commission.
Alaskan Relief.	Federal Radio Commission.
Alien Property Custodian.	Federal Reserve Board.
American Battle Monuments Commission.	Federal Trade Commission.
	General Accounting Office.
Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission.	Housing Corporation.
	Interstate Commerce Commission.
Board of Mediation.	National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.
Board of Tax Appeals.
Bureau of Efficiency.	Public Buildings and Public Parks.
Civil Service Commission.	Smithsonian Institution.
Commission of Fine Arts.	Tariff Commission.
Employees' Compensation Commission.	United States Geographic Board.
	United States Shipping Board.
Federal Board for Vocational Education.	United States Veterans' Bureau.

The subcommittee which prepared this measure was composed of Mr. WILLIAM R. WOOD, of Indiana, chairman; Mr. EDWARD H. WASON, of New Hampshire; Mr. JOHN W. SUMMERS of Washington; Mr. THOMAS H. CULLEN, of New York; and myself.

The work in its preparation was most pleasant and interesting, but it is a work of responsibility; because of which, I feel it obligatory upon me to present a report to the Congress of certain facts and conditions which developed in the preparation of the bill. Owing to the subject matter involved, of course, it is impossible to develop the entire work or any considerable portion thereof. I will call to your attention certain matters which I think of interest to the Congress not only in connection with the bill under discussion for the next few days but in respect of other legislation.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

In regard to the appropriation dealing with the maintenance of the Executive offices, it would appear that there is carried in this bill $91,280 less than the appropriation for the current fiscal year. That comes about because there was struck from this bill the sum of $90,000 carried for this year to defray expenses of the litigation involved in the cancellation of the oil leases. As a matter of fact, for the maintenance of the Executive Mansion and grounds, the bill carries a slight increase. There is an increase in the salaries for personnel amounting to $1,220. There is a decrease of $2,000 in the heating item. That heat item is carried in another bill. The heat for the Executive Mansion has been obtained from the State, War, and Navy Building. Of course, that means no saving to the Treasury of the United States. It is a mere matter of bookkeeping. An appropriation of $437,180 is carried for this activity.

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

This agency requests appropriation for one person, namely, the Alien Property Custodian. The Budget submitted its estimate in the sum of $7,500 per annum. The committee increases this amount to the sum of $10,000. I think that it is a reasonable charge for the responsibility and the proper discharge of official conduct.

It is an easy matter to attack this increase on the ground of economy. It can be said that the service of the present custodian, former Senator Howard Sutherland, has been secured for the lesser sum; and an argument might be presented that there are lessened duties involved. On October 31, 1927, there has been property aggregating the sum of $615,000,000, which had been in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian. To that date, $350,000,000+ had been paid out to claimants; of this amount, more than $16,000,000 was represented in interest and income derived from this property. Of this aggregate amount, some $58,000,000— was paid out under the Winslow bill wherein the amount of the claim was limited to $10,000.

On October 31, 1927, there was property aggregating $265,000,000— on hand. Of this amount, there was cash invested, used for working capital, in the sum of $300,000. No interest was being collected upon this item. This amount is smaller than any similar fund at the close of any year since the passage of the law. Likewise, the amount of cash with depositaries in the small sum of $25,000+ as compared with the high mark, at the close of the year, of $2,600,000+, in 1923. According to the record presented to us, this office, beginning with November 1, was made self-sustaining, which is explanatory of the decrease in the appropriation requested from that which was carried for the current fiscal year. That amount was $98,000. This is made possible by a change in the charges against the property and income in possession of this office. Heretofore the charge has been 1 per cent on income and one-fourth of 1 per cent on principal cash. Under the new plan the charge would be 2 per cent on income; nothing on receipts of principal, but 2 per cent on principal paid out. With this charge written off, Senator Sutherland states that the property will net an interest earning of 3½ per cent or more at the time of its return.

There has been a reduction in the number of employees between June 30, 1926, and October 31, 1927, of 55 in number; and an annual reduction in salaries of $63,000+.

The total cost of the office, including the charges preferred and collected from the property in income in their hands, to wit: $1,500,000+, is the sum of $5,500,000+.

AMERICAN BATTLE MONUMENTS COMMISSION

This commission has been empowered by Congress to construct fitting memorials in Europe in honor of our soldier dead now sleeping on foreign soil and to commemorate their unsullied sacrifice for country. The project is now well under way and consists of eight chapels erected in the cemeteries abroad, three large memorials and five smaller memorials commemorating the combat activities in the Army, two large memorials and three smaller memorials commemorating the work of the Navy, one memorial for the Service of Supply at Tours, France; one joint Army and Navy memorial to be erected in Rome; and two bronze tablets, which will mark the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces at Chaumont, France, and the headquarters of the First Army at Souilly, France.

The chapels will be located in the following cemeteries:

Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, near Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, France.

St. Mihiel American Cemetery, near Thiaucourt, France.

Ois-Aisne American Cemetery, near Fere-en-Tardenois, France.

Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, near Belleau, France.

Somme American Cemetery, near Bony, France.

Flanders Field American Cemetery, near Waereghem, Belgium.

Suresnes American Cemetery, at Suresnes (near Paris), France.

Brookwood American Cemetery, at Brookwood, England.

With reference to memorials outside of the cemeteries, the three largest ones will be erected at Montfaucon, on Montsec, and near Chateau-Thierry, France.

The five smaller battle-field monuments will be located as follows:

On Blanc Mont Ridge, in the Champagne region, France.
Near Bellicourt, France.
At Cantigny, France.
At Audenarde, near Ypres, Belgium.

In the city of Tours, France, a monument will be erected to the Services of Supply.

One of the large naval memorials will be erected at Brest, France, and the other in England. The three smaller naval memorials will be located at Gibraltar, at Corfu, Greece, and at Ponta Delgada, in the Azores.

In the chapels nearest the field of activity, where a most distinguished class of American soldier—the missing in action and the unknown—lost their lives, these soldier dead will have their names inscribed.

There are 3,177 in this class. The epitaph now carried on the crosses to the known soldier dead will be preserved in the chapel. The epitaph of the Unknown Soldier will be there. It is:

Here lies in honored glory an American soldier known but to God.

The authorization for this work is $3,000,000, and it is stated that the plans of the commission will be within this limitation. Incidentally, I inquired if the commission was satisfied with the chapels and memorials so designed, and we were told that they were considered suitable and appropriate and in keeping with the dignity of our Nation.

This item carries an appropriation of $700,000. It is the hope of the commission that this work will be completed in the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. May I ask the gentleman what is the estimated cost of this memorial work we are doing in France?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I can give the gentleman the estimated and the authorized cost. The entire project is to be carried through at an expense of $3,000,000 according to the program of the American Battle Monuments Commission, under the congressional authority.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I ask the question for the reason that I have a bill, as the gentleman knows, proposing the construction of a memorial shrine on the battle field at Chalmette, La., and I put the cost as an estimate at $250,000. I just wanted to see if the figures relatively would correspond.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It occurs to me that the project in regard to that battle field is a splendid one, and I can assure the gentleman that it has my hearty cooperation.

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE COMMISSION

The foundation and substructure of the Arlington Memorial Bridge is practically finished; a contract for the superstructure has been made and the stone therefor, in large part, is on hand, cut, and ready for use. We are told that they are keeping pace with the schedule originally planned and that the bridge will be completed in 1930 or 1931. The authorization for the bridge is $7,500,000. This bill carries for this item $2,300,000. Upon pages 30 to 33, inclusive, of the hearings there is a detailed and itemized statement of the expenditures of this commission, closing with November 30, 1927. This amount is $2,656,809.05.

This bill would carry the same number of employees at the same salary appropriated for 1928.

UNITED STATES BOARD OF MEDIATION

This is the first year of the life of this activity. Work in the field was begun October 1, 1926.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, there were 265 cases submitted to it. Eighty-one of these cases were settled without the necessity of setting up a board of arbitration; 57 were settled through mediation; 15 were withdrawn through mediation, and 9 were withdrawn voluntarily. One hundred and sixteen cases were adjusted so far as the responsibilities of the Board of Mediation are concerned. Of this last class, 32 cases were submitted to arbitration, of which number 15 had been concluded by awards and, since the beginning of the fiscal year, several other arbitrations have been concluded. There were 3 cases of which the board did not take jurisdiction.

At the end of the year 149 of the total of 265 cases received remained unsettled. Of this number, 92 had been assigned for mediation.

There are two general classes—those involving wages, rules, and working conditions falling in one group, and the so-called grievance cases which fall in the second group. There have been 85 of these so-called grievance cases submitted for adjustment, but there does not seem to have been disposition of any considerable number of them. The explanation for the delay in the complete adjudication of such cases is the failure of the individual or group alleging the grievance and the employer in agreeing upon the matter in which the adjustment board will be set up. The law provides that such board will be set up by the employer and the party aggrieved.

Under the statute, when mediation fails it is the duty of this board to induce the parties to the mediation to enter upon an arbitration agreement. If the dispute goes to arbitration and an award is made, it may be entered in the Federal court as a judgment of court. There has been only one appeal from an arbitration award. It was made by the carrier. There are five less employees to be paid under this bill, with a consequent reduction of $20,910 in salaries, than were appropriated for in 1928.

The appropriation seems to be $42,098 less than that carried in the bill for the present fiscal year, which is made up of the decreases in salaries and in the appropriations for the arbitration board.

The record discloses that arbitrations are ascending in numbers. Their costs have run between a minimum of $228.25 and a maximum of $14,606.80. With only $33,000 to run them past July 1, it is very evident that the amount carried in this bill will be considerably insufficient. So it is very probable that the total cost for 1929 will exceed that of 1928.

There is a rent item in connection with this activity to which I would call attention. The quarters of this board are located in the Earle Building. They use 7,057 square feet of space, for which they pay the sum of $13,800—a rate of $1.94 per square foot.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. I asked the question the other day, but could not get an answer as to approximately how much the Government pays for rentals in the District of Columbia.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have not been able as yet to reach the sum total, but it is my purpose to procure that and to convey the information to the House.

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

The amount carried in this bill is $720,740, which is $7,960 in excess of the appropriation for the present fiscal year. This increase is added amount for printing and binding the opinions of the board.

The work of this board has sped up considerably in comparison with the work of previous years, yet there remains much more to be done to make their work current. In 1925, they disposed of 995 cases in written findings of facts and opinions; in 1926, 990; in 1927, about the 2,000 mark in formal opinions. In November of this year, 496 new cases were filed and 516 were actually closed.

It might be well to show that up to December 1 of this year there had been filed with this board 32,598 cases; 13,776 actually closed. At the time of the hearing there were 16,310 cases awaiting trial with an added number of 1,615 pending the outcome of the negotiations between the commissioner and the taxpayer. This made a total of 17,925 cases on the docket awaiting trial. Of this number, there are some 1,800 involving one question affecting the Osage Indians. The chairman of the board estimated that 25 per cent of the cases on the docket would be settled without trial. He informed us that they were hearing cases now that were from eight months to a year old. In the present tax bill a provision is carried which, if enacted into law, would authorize the board to write memorandum opinions in cases of no special importance, or purely fact cases, without the necessity of separate findings of fact. This would speed up their work to some degree.

It is interesting to note that cases of any amount are considered by the board, $0.83 being the smallest amount involved. The average case involves $20,000 and the docketed cases involve approximately $750,000,000.

There was some discussion at the hearings in respect of the disposition of old records. It seems that they are kept current for six months. Some suggested that after the specified time, some said three years and some five, that these records might be destroyed. It occurs to me that the value of these records for future use, both in civil and criminal proceedings, has been underestimated by those who would acquiesce in their destruction. It is a court record involving in many instances millions of dollars, and might well be useful either on the part of the Government or on behalf of the taxpayer. It occurs to me that the same practice should be followed here that is followed in the Supreme Court, namely, the preservation of the entire record upon which the case in that court is adjudicated.

The rent item for this activity is $57,000. It represents an increase of $5,750 for added space over 1928. Quarters for this activity are in the Earle Building and, while the record is rather indistinct, the lowest average per square foot is $1.89.

There is no reduction in personnel contemplated, with an increase in salaries of $11,940.

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY

This item carries $210,350, which is same amount as present year. There is a decrease of four employees which, with the increase of salaries, makes a net reduction on salaries of $3,000.

I realize that there is considerable opposition developed to the work of this bureau and particularly as it affects the District of Columbia. It is an easy matter to realize the attitude of the departments, especially those in the District, toward their work. I am frank in the statement that while I have not had the opportunity to make an exhaustive study of the work of this bureau, from what I have seen of it I am inclined to think that its function is a much-needed work.

In the Bureau of Engraving and Printing they made recommendations for a new method of handling bank note currency orders in the wetting division, which resulted in the saving of one clerk. A new method of examining currency backs reduced the spoilage to a very marked degree. There was saved in 1927 more than 9,000,000 sheets of distinctive paper plus the cost of the previous printing operation. Including the cost of the paper, the labor, and ink required to print backs aggregate $13.04 per thousand. Deducting the total amount charged against the printers for spoilage in 1927 of $558.40, there is a saving of $135,000. According to the testimony of Mr. Brown, there has been a saving of more than $100,000 in the numbering division, due to recommendations of this bureau.

At the present time the matter of using paper wipers on the presses in lieu of rag wipers is being tested out with apparent success. Not only is finer work done, but there is a saving of approximately 50 per cent of the ink. Incidentally, they are experimenting now with a defibering machine that not only will recover all the old bills but will be able to take care of the paper toweling.

The plates are now being made for the making of the smaller-size currency, which will probably be put into circulation next year. It is estimated that this innovation will make a saving of about $2,000,000 a year.

A movement was instituted to permit purchase, in bulk, of food supply for Federal Government organization in the District which effected an annual saving estimated at $25,000. In connection with the purchase of supplies for the Government, though it developed there was some effort at coordination in the purchase of supplies in the District, there is an opportunity to effect a saving of much money by some attention to this work by the Congress as it affects other purchases.

Investigations into the various departments of the District government, which were made at the requests of various committees of Congress, the commissions of the District, and the Budget Bureau, there were several investigations into the activities of the District. From the noise which has gone up it is evident that the estimated annual saving in this work of some $160,000 has not been pleasing to certain persons in the District. In the hearings is a specific statement of the investigation made with the consequent savings.

Relative to automobile tags, it is shown that whereas they cost approximately 15 cents per pair last year, a tag this year manufactured by a plant which cost $17,250, for which the appropriation was made by Congress, will cost 11 cents this year, inclusive of depreciation and amortization of the cost of the plant.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

This bill carries an appropriation of $1,098,752, a decrease of $100,000+ over the appropriation for the preceding year. There seems to be an increase of about 31 additional employees. There is an increase of traveling expenses of $12,000.

The increase in the salaries is due, in the main, to additional examinations with the accompanying typists, clerks, and so forth, necessitated by the increase in the commission's work, due to legislation in the Sixty-ninth Congress. This additional employment will cost $45,060. The promotions pay $15,000.

During the last fiscal year 5,974 other eligibles were summoned for finger printing in New York City, 893 of whom for apparently obvious reasons failed to appear. Of those who appeared 122 were identified as having arrest record, who had made false statements in their applications concerning such arrests, and approximately 300 more were similarly identified, but who had not made false statements. The value of this work is obvious. This item will extend the fingerprint work to other cities with an increased appropriation of $6,000.

There is an item of $8,000 for research and examination tests; and $4,000 for one person to have charge of the New York City office. This does not entail a full increase of $4,000, as heretofore the secretary at New York has been detailed from the customs service. He did part-time service.

The rent item for the Civil Service Commission is $22,992. The rate per square foot is $0.51½.

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS

The item for this activity is the same which was appropriated for 1928, namely, $7,300. According to their report to us by way of the hearings, the quantity of work which they were called upon to do was very considerable. The manner in which it was done is strictly a personal conclusion.

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

The total amount carried in this bill for this item is $3,675,000, as compared to $3,648,240 for the present fiscal year. There is an increase of 80 employees; an increase in salaries, supplies, travel, and so forth, of $75,460 as compared with this year; $1,300 in printing; $50,000 less in the employees' compensation fund than in 1928.

The longshoremen's compensation act in the main is responsible for the increased personnel and increased allowance for personal service.

Under the Federal act of 1916 there have been about 20,000 claims a year filed. The number of injuries under the longshoremen's act was estimated at 40,000 a year. Rent of buildings is for quarters of the district offices. In 12 cities the average per square foot is $1.07.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Apparently there is an increase in personnel of 29 and a consequent increase in salaries of $80,340. As a matter of fact, there is no increase in personnel working under this commission nor in salary allowances. Heretofore personnel has been detailed to this commission from various departments and their salary paid from the department from which they were detailed. Now it is proposed to put them under the commission itself without increase in pay. It should inure to the benefit of the commission in morale. There is no increase in the total amount appropriated.

Under the act the commission is authorized to collect reasonable annual charges for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the administration of the act. There is an administrative charge against licenses on a basis of the primary horsepower of the projected license. The charge is 10 cents a horsepower for the first year, 15 cents for the second year, and for the third and every year thereafter 25 cents per horsepower.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

This item carries an amount of $80,560, with an increase in personnel of some 10 persons. The increased appropriation is $28,374. However, it is a new institution.

A very interesting discussion of the general subject was presented to the committee. It was shown that there were only 89 wave lengths for broadcasting which could be used in the United States; that there were approximately 680 broadcasting stations in this country. Twelve of the wave lengths allocated to this country are being shared between Canada and the United States. Canada has six wave lengths, which they may use exclusively, while we have 77.

The commission pointed out that radio was only a small part of the radio picture. We insert an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Caldwell, acting chairman of the commission, setting forth the activities who are desiring to go upon the air.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Wide interest has been aroused in the public hearings on the radio short-wave situation announced by the Federal Radio Commission to be held at Washington, beginning at 10 a. m. January 17, 1928.

Many different groups have requested opportunity to present their claims to be assigned channels in this part of the radio spectrum. Among those applying to be heard are:

Newspaper services.
Communication companies, domestic and transoceanic.
Airplane operating companies.
Navigation companies.
Railroads.
Department store chains.
Electric railways.
Interurban bus systems.
Electric power transmission systems.
Mining and oil companies.

Lumber companies.
Farm cooperative organizations.
Motion-picture producers.
Police and fire alarm systems.
Forest and watershed patrols.
Ranch owners.
Remote resorts and hotels.
Operators of facsimile transmission services.
Radio manufacturers.
Television inventors.
Radio broadcasters.
Packers and shippers.
Geologists.

In addition, representatives of the Army and Navy and of other Government services which operate or supervise short-wave communication systems, ship compasses, ship beacons, fog signals, airplane services, airplane beacons, and miscellaneous short-wave systems are also expected to attend and to tell of the developments which they are making and which might be affected by assignment of near-by short-wave channels to commercial services.

In view of the many and diversified applicants of short-wave channels already in sight, and since the present hearings are arranged to aid the commission in formulating future policies for the assignment of short-wave channels, all persons appearing at the hearings will be asked to discuss, initially, only the general claims of their respective classes of service to recognition in the short-wave bands, reserving their own specific applications for presentation at the close of the general discussion.

Representatives of each class of service applied for will be particularly invited to discuss:

(1) The dependence of such service upon short-wave radio rather than wire or other means.

(2) The humane, social, and economic importance of their proposals.

(3) The number and position of channels believed available for such service.

(4) Power required and interference likely to be caused to other services and other countries.

(5) The probable total number of applications which will be made for such service within the next five years by all applicants in their class.

All persons who feel that they can contribute information for the benefit of the commission are invited to be present and to take part in the discussion.

O. H. CALDWELL, Acting Chairman.

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

Appropriation for this activity is $3,820,000, which is $23,400 less than the appropriation for the present fiscal year. There is a reduction of five employees and total salary reduction of $15,000. There is a reduction of $22,400 for contingent expenses and a reduction of $1,000 on the printing.

HOUSING CORPORATION

The appropriation for this item is $475,750 or $88,486 less than for the past fiscal year. This is due to a decrease in office force in the District of Columbia of one person, an auditor, at a salary of $3,000 per year; $7,000 due to the closing of certain field offices. These offices so discontinued are New London, Waterbury, and Bridgeport, Conn.; Niagara Falls and Watervliet, N. Y.; Alliance and Niles, Ohio; and Craddockville, Va.

Some of these offices were consolidated with others. The main item in the reduction being ($76,886) a lesser amount appropriated for the maintenance, operation, and management of the hotels which seems to be very faithfully taken care of under the direction of Mrs. Sumner.

In the hearings it developed that there are four buildings in the District of Columbia under their jurisdiction which are occupied by other than Government hotels. The juvenile court of the District of Columbia occupies one building—four floors—19,564 square feet of floor space. Two buildings with floor space of 56,592 square feet are occupied by the National Guard, District of Columbia.

The Housing Corporation informs us that this space is furnished these District activities free of rent, the District paying a service charge. They pay what is supposed to be their proportion of the coal cost and their proportion of the ice cost. It seems that the Public Buildings Commission was the source of authority for the use of these buildings by the District activities.

The operation of the laundry has been handled skillfully. The departments not having their own laundry are using it. All departments sending more than 50,000 towels per month during the last year were given a reduced rate of $0.40 per 100, and yet the laundry operated at a profit of about a thousand dollars. A further reduction has been made, and this year the same rate was given to departments having 25,000 or more towels per month. There were laundered 2,500,000 towels and 59,000 miscellaneous pieces.

Before this laundry got into this game the average cost per 100 for the laundry of towels was $1.17. The lowest cost was $0.68 and the highest cost about $2. It is figured that there was a saving of $5,000 last year in its operation.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

The appropriation carried for this item is $600,000, an increase of $50,000 over appropriation for the last fiscal year.

There is a new item of $30,000 for monoplane to be used in connection with flight reach. Heretofore biplanes alone have been used in this connection. There is a slight increase in personnel and salary charge in the District and likewise in the field.

I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] if he can give me information as to what was done in respect of the $75,000 to construct an additional wind tunnel. Does the gentleman know whether that is carried in the bill?

Mr. WASON. I do not think it is.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I recall it, when it left the subcommittee the bill was to carry $75,000 for this new wind tunnel, which we thought would be of real benefit to this research work. I might say in regard to the wind-tunnel work that this country seems to occupy a position of preeminence. England has sought from us information in regard to this work and is building a similar wind tunnel.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS

A total of $2,584,980 is carried in the bill. This is an increase of $130,510 over the bill for 1928. An item of $30,000 under the item of "services" shows an increase of 21 persons, with increased salary of some $13,970.

Under the item of "general expense" we find an increase of $116,540. This commission has taken over several buildings, namely:

Emory	$22,000
Canal Street garage	12,000
Kalorama Road garage	13,000

There is an item of $10,000 for new elevator in the Winder Building that seems to be needed; an item of $7,000 for uniform for the guard, which is defended upon the ground that their salary is $85 per month.

It is very interesting to review the cost of rents under this activity. I will insert a table showing the rental cost, floor space, date received for operation, and cost per square foot:

Name of building	Rental	Floor area (square feet)	Date received for operation	Cost per square foot
Civil Service	$21,875.00	37,566	July 1, 1923	$0.51½

Earle Building	68,964.70	35,454		1.94
Canal Street garage		12,000
Kalorama Road garage		13,000

The upper floor of the Canal Street garage is to be used as files for the General Accounting Office, which moved out of a building in the Mall when it was torn down. The lower floor is being used for garage purposes. It houses 44 Department of Agriculture cars, and 7 machines of the General Accounting Office.

The Kalorama Road garage is being used for some 89 machines of the departments, 5 State, 12 Veterans' Bureau, 1 Trade Commission, and 4 Alien Property Custodian cars.

TARIFF COMMISSION

This bill carries appropriation of $754,000 for this activity, an increase of $68,000 over present year. There is an increase in personnel of six persons and total increase in salaries is $10,690. The major portion of the increase is in travel transportation which includes per diem in lieu of subsistence. I thought it might be of interest to the membership to insert a summary table of reports by the Tariff Commission to the President for purposes of section 315 of the tariff act of 1922, showing the action of the President thereon:

In connection with rent item for the headquarters of the commission in Brussels, I ascertained that there was floor space aggregating 1,157 square feet so used at a cost of $0.62 per square foot.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

I would like to call your attention to the Federal Trade Commission. Before I get down to a discussion of the bill as it affects this activity, I feel impelled to refer to certain language that is on page 9 of the report. This language reads as follows:

A limitation has been carried upon the appropriation for salaries and general expenses of the commission, and attention is called to the fact that under this limitation no investigation that does not relate to alleged violations of the antitrust acts may be undertaken upon the request of either House of Congress unless directed by concurrent resolution.

I am compelled to take issue with that statement in view of the opinion of the Comptroller General and the Attorney General of the United States. I am perfectly free to grant that Mr. WOOD, chairman of the subcommittee, takes the opposite view.

I quote from the report:

Testimony given before the committee indicated that many of the investigations directed by the Federal Trade Commission had no relation to matters involved in interstate commerce, merely being economic investigations, and the attention of the Congress is called to this misdirected energy of the commission.

Now, I can not agree with that language. I do not think it meets with the approbation of a majority of the members composing the subcommittee.

I do not think there should be an effort made to put pressure upon the Comptroller General or the Attorney General (if another opinion might be requested), and have it represented to them that this was the unanimous thought of the committee. So far as I am concerned, I disavow any agreement with the language involved.

The appropriation for this activity is in the sum of $963,000, which is a decrease of $21,350 over the appropriation for the current fiscal year. There is a decrease in personnel of two persons, with a consequent lessening of the appropriation of $2,930, and a decrease in travel expenses in the sum of $10,000.

The commission for its convenience has four major divisions, namely, legal, export trade, administrative, and economic. It is the latter division which drew the fire of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD, chairman of this subcommittee]. It seems that during the summer the commission initiated certain inquiries which the distinguished chairman felt were beyond their jurisdiction in virtue of a certain limitation which he had placed upon an appropriation bill, but from the record, it appears that Attorney General Sargent did not interpret the limitation as Mr. WOOD interprets it.

The four inquiries concerning which much discussion was had are designated as follows:

Resale price-maintenance inquiry;
The blue-sky inquiry;
The du Pont inquiry; and the
Price-bases inquiry.

BLUE-SKY SECURITIES INVESTIGATION

Several years ago a report was prepared and submitted to the commission correlating the law of the various States upon this subject. It seems to have been relegated to the background and had not been kept current. This inquiry merely brought the former report down to date. It involved a very inconsiderable sum, and because of the many complaints which come before the commission growing out of the issuance of fraudulent securities, it seems to me that it was necessary work and within the power of the commission.

DU PONT INQUIRY

This resolution resulted from the fact that E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co., from published financial reports, had a large investment in General Motors, and that this same du Pont company had acquired a large holding in the United States Steel Corporation. This inquiry was to ascertain the relationships, direct or indirect, among these corporations tending to bring them under common ownership, control, or management, with information as to the proper economic consequences of such community of interests.

There was a very considerable difference of opinion between the chairman [Mr. WOOD] and Commissioner Myers as to whether this information stirred up a muss or abated one, or whether it caused depreciation in the value of the stocks on the market or enhanced it. Being interested to know just what effect it had on the market value, I caused to have inserted in the RECORD a statement showing the market value a couple weeks prior to the announcement that the inquiry would be had, and some two weeks subsequent thereto. It seems that the market value of all these stocks were gradually rising prior to the announcement and continued the upward trend. In each instance stocks reached a higher price after the announcement than they had on the day of the announcement or several days prior thereto, and have continued the upward trend up to the date of the hearing. I do not feel that the inquiry had any detrimental effect upon the value of the stock in question. It is the function of the commission under the law to ascertain if there has been any violation in any of the antitrust statutes. Subsection a of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act is additional authority for the inquiry.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman, Was that investigation initiated by the commission itself or in answer to a resolution of one of the Houses of Congress?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It was initiated by the commission itself. In this connection I might say that the Federal Trade Commission replaced what was designated as the Bureau of Corporations in the Commerce and Labor Department. The Bureau of Corporations came into being in 1902, and its sole function was investigating questions of this character. Why, it was the Bureau of Corporations that was the main weapon in the hands of the "trust-busting" Theodore Roosevelt. Their economic investigations were his right arm—his big stick in his endeavor to prevent monopolistic control.

PRICE-BASES INQUIRY

Referring to the price-bases inquiry, the reference of Mr. Humphrey to it is rather unusual. Originally he questioned the power of the commission to initiate the inquiry. Upon his attention being called to the fact that it might have jurisdiction, he agreed that it had the power under proper resolution, but that the particular resolution involved was not sufficient upon which to base the inquiry, but it developed near the conclusion of his second appearance before the committee that his real objection to the inquiry was he was fundamentally opposed to the policy.

The Pittsburgh-plus case was decided by the Federal Trade Commission some time in 1924, and Mr. Van Fleet, who was formerly a member of the commission—I do not know whether he was a member when he testified before the committee last year or not—but Mr. Van Fleet stated that the Pittsburgh-plus case saved to the consumers of the West $30,000,000. Some one in that connection said that if the Federal reserve bank building——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Over what period of time was that saving of $30,000,000? I think that would be the annual saving.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I took it to be an annual saving, but I wanted to be exact, and I found the language of the testimony simply said $30,000,000. It was either an annual saving or the saving from the time of the decision up to the time he testified before the committee.

One gentleman at that hearing—I do not know whether it was Mr. Van Fleet or not—said it was estimated that if the Federal reserve bank in Chicago had been constructed at a time subsequent to the deciding of the Pittsburgh-plus case there would have been a saving of $60,000 in that building alone.

Prior to the decision of the Federal Trade Commission it was the policy of the steel corporations to sell steel in this way: A firm in Chicago would give a consumer a price. It was the Pittsburgh price plus the freight between Pittsburgh and the destination of the steel.

Undoubtedly the Pittsburgh-plus case saved much money to the consuming public, particularly in the Middle West and the West. Of course, it can not be determined as to what benefit will be derived from this study, but it seems to me to be authorized both by law and the purpose for which the commission was created.

In other words, if the steel were coming out of Chicago, you can see that not only were the Pittsburgh interests protected but the steel selling company would receive as an added profit the difference between the freight from Pittsburgh to the point of consignment and the freight from his shipping plant to the point of consignment.

There seems to be several methods of arriving at sale prices. There is the Pittsburgh-plus method; there is the factory base method, making the factory price f. o. b. plus the freight to the consignee. The automobile companies give you the price f. o. b. Detroit, and they charge for freight on the machine from that point to the place of consignment.

Then there is the delivered-price method—that is, if a firm in Washington is selling merchandise consigned to San Francisco it sells at a delivered price—that is, the same price as if it were selling to some one in Baltimore. Of course, the purchaser in Baltimore is going to pay a part of the freight on the purchase shipped to San Francisco.

I submit that the price-bases inquiry is not only a legitimate inquiry but a proper inquiry to be made by the Federal Trade Commission.

There is one other inquiry. It is the resale maintenance-price inquiry. I am frank to say that I was not much impressed with the resale maintenance-price inquiry, but irrespective of my personal opinion I am confident that it was within the power of the commission to institute it.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

For this activity the appropriation is $944,162, which is $15,549 less than appropriated for the current fiscal year. The cost of general administration, to wit, $32,500, is carried in this bill, whereas heretofore it had been paid by Smithsonian private income. This item is made up of salary for 16 employees and other administrative expenses. The endowment which may be designated "Smithsonian funds," is $1,385,279.75; the invested funds of the Freer bequest, $4,171,880.61.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Now, as to the Interstate Commerce Commission the amount is $326,569 more than was carried in the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. How much less does the gentleman say the appropriation is for the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. $326,569.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what item does that apply?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The main item is in the valuation work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is because the valuation has made such progress?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would not say that. The work of valuation has not been finished, but I think that will carry it along in conformity with the policy of the commission.

Mr. BRIGGS. The other activities of the commission have been adequately provided for—they are provided sufficient funds to carry on so that the commission will not be hampered in conducting their necessary inquiries?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. They tell us that in the formal complaint department they are much in need of more attorney examiners; that there is quite a congestion in that quarter, but the appropriation for this activity has been going up and up, and it was the judgment of the subcommittee that this appropriation would be adequate.

Mr. BRIGGS. The part I am interested in is that the inquiries will not be unnecessarily delayed; that the action of the commission will not be unnecessarily hampered by having insufficient staff so that the question of freight rates can be promptly disposed of.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman expresses his views very well, and they are my views. I have no desire to hamper the work of the commission. But we thought after careful study that they might get along as well under this amount as they would if we had increased the appropriation. The increase of $263,000 would not go to that work; it would go to the valuation work.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, the committee has endeavored to provide enough money so that on the rate question the commission can discharge its duties promptly and satisfactorily?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The commission feels that they should have additional attorney examiners, and these examiners work in the cases to which the gentleman refers. As I recall it, Commissioner Lewis stated that the work of valuation was going along very well.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course, I feel that these rate problems presented to them for decision ought to be provided for so that the commission can reach a decision within a reasonable period. These questions have got to be so very important to the various interests throughout the country that the commission ought to be adequately staffed.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is an increase in the general expense item of $103,900, which is made up of increased personnel and other miscellaneous expenses. Twelve thousand seven hundred and forty-five dollars is added in the travel expense of the employees in the field. There is $80,000 less appropriated for printing and binding.

VETERANS' BUREAU

The amount carried in this bill for this activity, $526,193,111; $7,715,303 less than appropriated for the current fiscal year. There is a decrease in salaries and expense of two and a half million dollars. There is a total decrease in the personnel of some 12 persons, but there is an increase in salaries for the personnel of the departmental service, and the field service, of $470,846. There is an increase in military and naval compensation of $7,100,000; a decrease in military and naval insurance of $7,250,000.

There is a decrease in the appropriation for medicine and hospital service of $3,600,000 and decrease in hospital facilities and service of $1,000,000.

There is one point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and that is in regard to the hospitalization of veterans. As I understand it, the tubercular load has reached its peak, but the neuropsychiatric load has not reached its peak. I made the statement a few days ago that the peak would not be reached until 1935, but I was informed by a gentleman, whom I consider an authority, that the neuropsychiatric peak will not be reached until 1940. The World War Veterans' Committee, which has charge of this legislation, reported to this House at the last session a blanket authorization, which would have provided a number of hospitals that would take care of these neuropsychiatric cases. They are having hearings and will soon report to the House another hospital bill. It seems to me that some plan ought to be worked out whereby these hospitals can actually be constructed within the lifetime of the soldiers.

I am not prone to find fault, but time is going on. I was told one time by a commission in Kentucky that a certain thing had to be governed by the fiscal year, but I told them that in my country we live by the calendar year and did not live by the fiscal year. But the point I want to call to your attention is this: Kentucky is the center of a very large area that has no neuropsychiatric hospital facilities. The southern part of Indiana, Illinois, part of Ohio, West Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky comprise the area to which I refer. Twice the World War Veterans' Committee has reported to this House a hospital bill which would relieve this area; once a separate bill for Kentucky; and in the last session, in this blanket bill, they had a million-dollar, 250-bed neuropsychiatric hospital for Kentucky. My position is if the neuropsychiatric veteran has a service-connected case, he has been entitled to hospitalization all these years, and is entitled to hospitalization now. He ought not to have to wait an additional two years to get facilities. In that area you can not get facilities for cases of that kind. The general hospital does not take them, and the tuberculosis hospital does not take them, and the Chillicothe hospital (neuropsychiatric) is overflowing. The load in Ohio alone is more than sufficient to take care of it. In fact, there is an increase provided in the hospital bill for Chillicothe for neuropsychiatric cases. I hope that some time in the near future we will see a realization of this need.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

The amount carried in this bill is $12,888,750, which is $1,250 less than appropriated for the present fiscal year. It is $1,400,000 less than the estimate of the Budget for 1929. From the testimony before us it would appear that the fiscal year of 1927 was the most successful year in its history. It would seem that in the five months of the present fiscal year ending November 30, 1927, there has been a considerable improvement in its operation. We quote from the statement of Mr. O'Connor, chairman of the Shipping Board:

OPERATING RESULTS OF MERCHANT FLEET CORPORATION

The operating results of the Merchant Fleet Corporation during the past year have been the most successful in its history, notwithstanding there has been a slight decrease in the amount of salaries.

The most recent statement which we have prepared on operating results covers the five months ending November 30, 1927, compared with the corresponding five months of the previous year, and indicates a reduction of over $1,800,000 between these two periods. This is an improvement of about 26.5 per cent and results principally from the smaller voyage losses reported for freighters and combined passenger and cargo vessels, and from increased profits for voyages of the vessels of the United States lines. Revenues for these services for the period from July to November, 1927, are better than they were in the same period last year, and reductions in operating expenses have been made which also contribute to the improvement in results. The laid-up fleet expenses have also been reduced during the past six months at the rate of about $500,000 per annum.

During the year ending June 30, 1926, the board operated an average of 262 vessels, carrying 9,596,614 tons of freight at an operating deficit of $19,606,608. During the year ending June 30, 1927, it operated 301 vessels, carrying 11,245,963 tons of freight, at an operating deficit of $15,926,411; thus while increasing the number of vessels in operation, it carried 1,600,000 more tons of American commerce at a reduction in cost of $3,680,000.

We quote further from his statement:

REDUCTION IN OPERATING DEFICIT

The reduction in cost to the United States for the establishment of equitable ocean freight rates, regular and dependable sailings of American-flag ships, is graphically shown by the table depicting the steady decline in operating deficit of the Government-owned fleet from nearly $43,000,000 during the fiscal year 1923 to nearly $16,000,000 during the fiscal year 1927.

PERCENTAGE OF DRY CARGOES CARRIED

As an indication of the trend of foreign commerce of the United States in respect to the flag under which this commerce is transported, I submit herewith a statement showing the percentage of overseas dry cargo carried in American and foreign flag vessels and the percentage of all cargo carried. This shows the calendar years 1921 to 1926, and from January to June, 1927. The table indicates that on the overseas dry cargoes, which excludes tanker cargoes and cargo termed "nearby" foreign (which is to and from the West Indies, Central America, and Canadian ports) during the calendar year 1921, American-flag vessels carried 31 per cent. During the calendar year 1926 they carried 21 per cent, and for the first six months of the calendar year 1927 they carried 33 per cent. The overseas dry cargo is that part of our foreign commerce which is subject to the most competition from foreign ships, and it is to the carrying of this cargo that the Shipping Board is bending its greatest efforts.

SALE OF VESSELS

During 1927 the board sold 50 individual vessels and 2 for restricted operation. Recently the board authorized the advertising for sale of the three large Pacific coast services, namely, the American Oriental Line, the Oregon Oriental Line, and the American-Australia Orient Line.

LAID-UP FLEETS

During the past few months our laid-up fleets have been reorganized, with the results that our request for funds for liquidation expenses for 1929 was reduced to $2,250,000 or $750,000 less than was granted for the present fiscal year. These expenses for 1926 were $3,432,000, and it is estimated they will be less than $3,000,000 for the current fiscal year. Liquidation expense includes cost of laid-up fleet, sales, and a certain percentage of administrative expense not strictly chargeable to operation.

On December 1 the board held a total of 803 vessels, of which 312 were assigned to operators, 5 on bareboat charter or loaned to other Government departments, and 491 were inactive or laid up.

SHIPPING BOARD

The total sales value of these 52 ships sold by the Shipping Board during the fiscal year 1926–27 is $6,990,936.50. The dead-weight tonnage of these vessels is 346,550, approximately $20 per ton.

Originally there were some 2,400 vessels under their control, and disposition has been made of all of them except 803. Fifty-two were disposed of during the past fiscal year. The 803 vessels are made up of the following:

Cargo vessels	751
Passenger vessels	13
Refrigerator vessels	14
Tankers	11
Tugs	12

The United States Line at present, consisting of five vessels and four tankers, is under the direct operation of the Merchant Fleet Corporation. The other vessels are operated by operating companies. In connection with United States Line, there is a limitation concerning this bill looking toward the addition of reconditioned boats for this line, namely, the Mount Vernon and the Monticello. The cost of reconditioning is not to exceed $12,000,000, of which $10,000,000 is to be loaned from the construction loan fund. Passing over the question of their loaning money to themselves, about which I express no opinion, I will discuss the proposed reconditioning of these vessels.

It is stated to us in the hearings that the addition of these two vessels, after reconditioning, to the United States Line will round out the line permitting of weekly sailings from New York. It is proposed that the vessels will have a speed of not less than 20 knots. The vessels in question are 20 years old, but the report from the chief surveyor of the American Bureau of Shipping places the life of the Mount Vernon after reconditioning at a minimum of 10 years' service. The Monticello does not seem to be in quite such excellent shape as that of the Mount Vernon, but this same authority opinionates that she can operate as a passenger vessel for 10 years.

With the speed proposed, General Dalton stated that the mail revenue alone would amount to $1,380,000 for the two vessels. He further stated that the two ships could not be built to-day for less than $25,000,000. It seems that they were designed and built as naval auxiliaries by the German Government, and that the hulls alone are worth $4,500,000 as they stand, to reproduce.

I have been laboring under the opinion that the net profit which these two vessels would earn after reconditioning is a much larger sum than that which is carried in the report. The report states that the sum of $400,000 would be earned per annum by each vessel. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee to inform me if those figures are correct, or if the testimony of General Dalton on that point is correct. I am frank to say that if the language of the report, which says that each vessel would earn $400,000 per annum after reconditioning, is correct, then I am not in favor of reconditioning them, because they are only going to last 10 years, and you would have a return of only $8,000,000 from the two vessels.

In page 716 of the hearings, General Daiton stated before the subcommittee that these two boats would return $2,550,000 per year more than the expenses. Would the gentleman from Indiana kindly inform us in respect to that?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to what he stated:

I should like to go just a little bit further in explaining this situation to the committee respecting the reconditioning of these two vessels. The overhead administrative expense of the United States Lines, in the first place, would not be appreciably increased. It is just as easy to run eight ships as it is to run six ships so far as the general overhead administrative expense is concerned. There might be a slight amount extra necessary in connection with advertising probably, which we have taken care of.

In order to be perfectly fair in determining the profit in operation of $1,278,809, for each vessel, if reconditioned, we have set up as an administrative charge against the United States Lines $227,629 per year for each of the two ships. That is entirely out of proportion to what the actual cost would be, but in setting up any statement of this kind we have tried to be very conservative.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will continue on he will find my source of authority relative to the statement regarding $2,550,000 for the operation of these two boats.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman will remember that there could be checked against them what their expense might be, but we should take into consideration the operation of the entire fleet.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But the $227,639 administration charge is against the profit. I think a goodly portion of that should be taken out. That would make profit of even a larger sum.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will recall, if we had these two ships, which would give us two weekly sailings instead of one, we could get more profit on the other ships.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes. But General Dalton said that the earnings from the operation of these vessels would exceed the expense by $2,550,000 a year. I was rather stunned when I saw the statement that a "very careful estimate indicated that each vessel would approximate $400,000 per annum after reconditioning," because General Dalton said they would earn a profit of $2,550,000; and that took into consideration the administration charge of $227,629 for each vessel. Later on in his testimony he said if they could accomplish only three-quarters of their estimate they would have a profit of $1,900,000 a year for the two vessels.

Mr. CULLEN. The gentleman should remember that notwithstanding the spending of that money as a general proposition, it would round out the lines of the fleet, and the lines themselves would show a profit; and that would be the best thing to do.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman, but it was on the basis that that return was going to be approximately $2,550,000. In another part of the testimony General Dalton said these boats would earn $1,248,000 each. I recall those figures.

Mr. WOOD. But General Dalton added this to what the gentleman has already said:

That is based on a very conservative estimate, and included, of course, a very large mail business which we are sure we could get. We have a 24-hour differential in our favor, so that we could compete with the six and one-half day foreign ships, our greatest competitor. But if we could only accomplish three-fourths of our estimate we would then have coming into the line as a profit over the cost of operation about $1,900,000 per year for the two vessels. Out of that profit on operations there could be replaced the amount drawn from the loan and construction fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CULLEN. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That grew out of the misunderstanding of a question I asked General Dalton in an earlier part of the testimony, when I asked him what the increased profit would be. He misunderstood me. If you follow that through on the next succeeding page, page 718, you will see he goes back to this other proposition. He says:

I referred only to the profit on the reconditioned vessels in the amount of $1,278,000 for each vessel, which is independent of the other vessels of the United States Lines.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HARE. Who is responsible for the discrepancy in that statement regarding the income of $400,000?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In my opinion, that is an error.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In the record it was stated by those in authority that after 10 years of use in first-class activity these vessels would also be good for another 10 years.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That was particularly true with respect to the Mount Vernon.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It was especially true that one and the other was not expected to go out of service at the end of 10 years, so that some allowance should be made in the value of the vessels at the end of the period, and some consideration should be given to the fact that some of the other vessels are tied up now and are not earning anything.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I favored the reconditioning of these vessels as a business proposition. There was an endeavor to make a picture that these vessels would be valuable in time of national distress. I am not particularly impressed with that phase of it.

In checking up the personnel end of this bill, I find that there is an increase in the average number of employees for the activities in the bill of some 659 persons; and a reduction of 273 persons. The increased personnel, therefore, would be 385 persons.

In summing up this bill is $7,715,303 less than the appropriations for 1928 and under the Budget estimate with $1,360,691 to spare. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9481 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDRESS OF HON. LEONIDAS C. DYER

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, at a meeting of the Missouri Society of Washington, D. C., held in the hall of nations at the Washington Hotel on Saturday evening January 14, 1928, an address was delivered by Hon. LEONIDAS C. DYER, Representative in Congress from Missouri, on the subject of China, on which occasion were present several hundred Missourians, including Gen. John J. Pershing, and also Dr. Sao-Ke Alfred Sze, Minister from China, and Madame Sze.

Realizing the value of the information gained by Mr. DYER during his personal visits and extensive travels in China, as outlined in this splendid address, I ask unanimous consent to have the same printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by his colleague, Mr. DYER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

CHINA

Mr. DYER. China, on the opposite side of the earth to us, is much like the United States in its area and size, China being slightly larger than the United States. The Chinese are principally engaged in agriculture and have been so for a long time. However, there are now many of them living in the larger cities and engaging in other pursuits. The Chinese are a quiet people and not apt to become excited.

Their religion, if such it may be called, is Confucianism. Confucianism may be better said to be a system of morals. The real name of Confucius was from his family name, Kung. He was called Kung the Master, Kung Fu Tze. That combination of syllables was too difficult for European tongues, and so it was latinized into the form with which we are familiar. The great teacher was born in Shantung in 551 B. C. and died there in 478, and his grave is one of the sacred shrines of China. Some of his teachings were: "The father who does not teach his son his duties is equally guilty with the son who neglects them." "Let the government be good and the people will be good." "The great God has conferred even on inferior people a moral sense, compliance with which would show their nature invariably right." He taught the brotherhood of mankind when he said, "Within the four seas all men are brothers." He taught the "silver rule," which is negative as contrasted with the golden rule of Jesus, saying, "What you would not have another do to you, do not do to him," but is a noble precept none the less. It would have amazed him to be told that millions would one day render him worship. Yet for at least twelve hundred years in the Temple of Confucius in Peking the Emperor twice a year offered sacrifice. Twice a year also in 1,560 temples similar observances have been carried on for more than a millennium.

In Asia, which includes China, Japan, and India, live practically two-thirds of the world's population—1,816,000,000. All of the religions of the world have come from Asia. This includes our religion. More people belong to the Christian religion than any other, numbering 700,000,000. The Confucians number 300,000,000; Mohammedan, 235,000,000; Buddhist, 200,000,000; Hindu sects, 217,000,000; and Shintoist, 25,000,000.

The civilization of China is the oldest in the world, and was a contemporary of Greece, Egypt, and Rome. From 2000 B. C. to 1842 A. D. the Chinese were a happy and a prosperous people. During this time they made great accomplishments. They invented lenses from crystals, mariner's compass, gunpowder, printing, and paper making. They made great contributions to literature and art, to religion and philosophy, to morals and ethics, to trade and commerce, to business and banking, to the domestication of useful plants and animals, and other conquests over nature, including human nature. Other great accomplishments by the Chinese of that period was the building of the great wall, the Ming tombs, the Temple of Heaven, the Hall of Classics, the Forbidden City, the gorges of the Yangtze, and the works in paper, porcelain, silk, jade, cloisonné, carpets, etc.

The Chinese have never been a warlike people. China has always taken the position that people were good, and that they could be governed and reasoned with by moral persuasion. Europe took for granted that people were evil and that they could only be controlled by force. The Chinese have relied upon reason rather than force. The Chinese went along under their splendid system of morals and government during this whole period. They were prosperous and happy. Marco Polo, who visited the Imperial Government at Peking in the thirteenth century, reported that he had never seen such refinement, hospitality, and evidences of peace in government and prosperity. Marco Polo came to China from the most refined part of Europe at that time, and hence his opinion is worth much.

Things went along in this fashion in China until about the beginning of the eighteenth century, at which time India was being gradually absorbed by European powers. Sea adventurers, including pirates, at this time began to reach China. They mistreated the peaceable Chinese and forced trade with them to the disadvantage of the Chinese. Among the things that these Europeans forced upon the Chinese at this period was opium. This evil became so great that the Emperor tried to stop it. In trying to do this he endeavored to limit foreigners to the port of Canton. He also endeavored to put through restrictive measures concerning missionaries. This caused trouble between Europe and the Chinese and brought on China's first real trouble, the war with England, 1840–1842. This war is known as the opium war, due to China's desire to prevent the smuggling of opium into China. China was defeated by England in this war, with the attendant loss of Hong Kong and the forcible opening to trade with Canton, Amoy, Fuchau, Ningpo, and Shanghai, and the payment of a $21,000,000 indemnity.

Following this came demands from other European countries, as well as Japan, for slices of the Chinese territory and special privileges. Among these was the setting aside of Chinese territory in various cities and ports to foreign governments for the establishment of national settlements, the foreigners to have their own courts and laws. These continued demands upon China by foreign powers, and China's inability to withstand them, due to military weakness, brought about serious trouble among the Chinese themselves and an antiforeign feeling. Although China has had a population during thousands of years, estimated at 400,000,000, never had she up to this time had a larger army than 100,000. China had never needed a large army, because the chief characteristics of the Chinese were peace and good will among its own people and its neighbors in Asia. This antiforeign feeling and desire to overthrow the ruling force in China because they had lost "face" in yielding to the foreigners brought on what is known as the Boxer uprising. For this the powers demanded an indemnity of $300,000,000. The Chinese are still paying this to many of the powers. I am proud to say that my own country has declined to accept any of this money. The continued demand of the foreigners and the granting of concessions to them by the weak Imperial Government of China finally resulted in the revolution of 1911 and the establishment of the Republic of China. The Chinese people had not had sufficient experience and knowledge to establish a real republic. The result has been that so-called war lords, or militarists, have largely taken over China, and, in most instances for their own gain, have kept China in a turmoil, exhausting the resources of the country in maintaining armies. However, at this time there is a real national spirit in China, and we can look for unity of the people who wish to save China for the Chinese and to have a government of its own people that will work for the happiness and prosperity of the nation.

We of this country are anxious to see China put its house in order and make for itself great prosperity and happiness. The United States has never demanded of China any concessions or "spheres of influence." We are anxious to help the Chinese in every way possible. Our interest in China is, in part, for trade and commerce. The United States is a country of great wealth, it now being estimated to be about $400,000,000,000. This Nation is now producing on our farms and in our factories more than we can consume at home. We need markets for this overproduction. Asia, the Pacific, and China contain our best opportunity. The United States exported last year products to the value of $4,007,000. We imported products, many of which were raw materials for use in our factories and mills, to the value of $3,891,000,000. Three billion dollars of these imports came in free of duty. With China our trade is substantial and is increasing.

Our first effort to engage in trade and commerce with China was in 1784. On February 22 of that year a ship that measured 360 tons, called the Empress of China, sailed from New York with a cargo of ginseng, a root grown in North America, and which is of great value in China for medicinal purposes. This ship reached Canton on August 23, taking six months to make the trip from New York to China. This ship disposed of its cargo of ginseng and purchased silks and tea from the Chinese, which it disposed of on its return. On this ship, the Empress of China, when sailing from New York on August 23, 1784, was Major Shaw, who carried with him a commission from President George Washington as consul and commercial agent of the United States Government at Canton. Our trade with China, in these early days, was good and so continued until our Civil War. After the close of that war we again entered the trade with China and have continued it more or less ever since.

Modern China may be said to have begun in the year of 1890, the Chinese not showing any special signs of a desire for western commodities until that date. China's total foreign trade—imports and exports—increased from about $91,000,000 in 1865 to $115,000,000 in 1895. By 1915 it had increased to $550,000,000, and in 1926 had reached a grand total of $1,832,726,000.

The change in the character of the trade is even more noteworthy than the growth in volume. In 1880, for example, the imports of China consisted of opium, 40 per cent; cotton piece goods, 30 per cent; metals, 5 per cent; whereas in 1925 the imports, amounting to about $800,000,000 gold, consisted of cotton goods and cotton yarn, 9 per cent; raw cotton, 7 per cent; kerosene oil, 7 per cent; metals, 4 per cent; tobacco and cigarettes, 4 per cent. Opium had dropped out of China's legitimate imports completely. Kerosene imports, which had amounted to 3,500,000 gallons in 1880, reached in 1925 a total of 258,000,000 gallons. By 1925 a total of the main commodities was only 37 per cent of the whole—less than the opium alone in 1880—the remaining 63 per cent being made up of a great number of the articles that contribute to the necessities of modern economic life.

The exports of China show a somewhat similar change, with a total of $650,000,000 gold for 1925, consisting of raw silk, 20 per cent; beans and bean products, 18 per cent; raw cotton, 4 per cent; skins, hides, and furs, 4 per cent; peanut and peanut products, 3 per cent; the remaining 51 per cent was made up of such varied exports as egg products, tungsten, antimony, vegetable oils; with tea no longer an export factor of first importance.

In the earlier years Great Britain had an overwhelmingly predominant place in China's trade, but in recent years the United States and Japan have been rapidly crawling up. The United States is especially predominant in two or three particular lines; in petroleum, for example, and soft-wood lumber, cotton-piece goods, and automobiles. It is also a fact that American canned goods are rapidly increasing in use in China, as well as fresh fruits and vegetables from the United States in spite of the fact that China has a remarkable selection of vegetables and fruits. In 1925 almost 30,000,000 boxes of American oranges were imported into Shanghai alone. American flour has also become one of the important imports. It is evident from these facts that the trade with China is rapidly increasing. A much greater increase in trade with that country and the Orient at large is to be anticipated, coming from an increasing population, added wants and desires of the people, and especially perhaps from added purchasing power.

According to an article appearing in the November Bulletin of the American Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai, the United States led all countries in the foreign trade of China with the exception of Japan for the year, 1926, the customs figures for which are now available. The following statistical table which was specially prepared for the bulletin tells the story of what happened in China's foreign trade last year:

	Imports from China	Exports to China	Total of imports and exports
Japan	$336,909,441	$211,740,889	$548,650,330
America	187,647,086	150,113,103	337,760,189
Hong Kong	124,472,673	93,802,031	218,274,704
Great Britain	116,269,419	55,835,783	172,105,202
British India	79,191,013	15,922,101	95,113,114

The article which accompanied the foregoing table stated that if the three totals for goods of British origin—Hong Kong, Great Britain, and British India—are added together the total would exceed that for the United States; but, on the other hand, a considerable percentage of the commodities handled by Japan are exported to or imported from the United States, and although not mentioned in the Bulletin, it is also a fact that a considerable portion of the trade of Hong Kong with China which is all listed as "British" is either of American origin or destined for American consumption. The writer of the foregoing calls attention to certain interesting phases of American trade with the Orient with which the public is not generally familiar. For example, the average layman believes that the United States buys more from Europe than from any other continent, whereas, as a matter of fact, America buys more from Asia than from Europe. During 1926 Asia furnished 31.6 per cent of America's, which was a larger percentage than in any previous year and over twice as great as during the average of the pre-war years 1910–1914. We are also told that America's trade with China is greater than with Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the Netherlands, Colombia, and many other smaller countries, and that the volume of America's trade to and from China exceeds that of any country in South America.

The United States has been the one great power that has shown real friendship for China. This country has called a halt on the other powers in their desire to carve China into "spheres of influence." This fact was evidenced at the Washington conference during the administration of President Harding. The United States Government has two specially great foreign policies. One of these is the Monroe doctrine, which applies to North and South America, and the other the open-door policy, which applies to China. Our open-door policy, specifically declared by Secretary of State John Hay, means that the United States will insist on the preservation of the territorial integrity of China and safeguard to the world the principle of equal and impartial trade with all parts of China.

The China trade acts, of which I am the author and which were recently enacted into law, was to further cement the good will existing among Americans and Chinese. It enables them to do business together for their mutual benefit. Americans possess in China a marvelous asset in the good will of the people. Chinese throughout the country look upon Americans as their best friends, because America has always respected China's territorial integrity, prohibited its nationals engaging in the opium traffic, returned $11,000,000 of its Boxer indemnity, and has 4,000 of its nationals, spending about $15,000,000 each year, in missionary work in China, including modern educational institutions, medical school and hospital facilities, and general constructive activities.

JOHN W. DWIGHT

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce the sudden death of a former Member of this House, the Hon. John W. Dwight, of New York. Mr. Dwight was for many years an influential and valuable Member of this House. He had the confidence and friendship of the membership on both sides of the aisle. With the death of Mr. Dwight another of the strong, virile men of the old régime passes on to join Speaker Cannon, Speaker Clark, James R. Mann, Sereno Payne, and many others that we older men so well remember, and whose memory we all revere and respect.

In making this sad announcement I am announcing the death of a very warm personal friend, and my feelings will be shared by many of the older Members of this House.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, as one of the older Members of the House I wish to bring a word of tribute, love, and affection for my long-time friend, John W. Dwight. He was the Republican whip of this House when I entered it and was kind enough to make me one of his regional assistants early in my career here, so that I had the privilege of working with him and under him. The office of party whip was then an important and powerful one, and he was ideally fitted and equipped for the place. He was the right-hand man of the then all-powerful Speaker, and as such exerted an important influence over the work of the House. By reason of my close connection with him I soon came to have a very deep and genuine affection for Mr. Dwight, which was beautifully reciprocated and which endured to the end. His death brings real sorrow to my heart.

STABILIZING THE BUYING POWER OF MONEY

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech I delivered before the Stable Money Association on the question of stabilizing the buying power of money.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me I herewith insert a speech which I delivered before the Stable Money Association at one of its sessions on December 30, 1927, in Washington, D. C., on the important question of stabilizing the buying power of money.

This subject received a great deal of attention not only in the sessions of the Stable Money Association but also from several of the so-called "learned societies," which held their annual meetings during the week between Christmas and New Year. The evils of fluctuating price levels and the instability of the buying power of the dollar have attracted the attention of economists generally, as well as other people interested in public questions. Many believe that the problem can be solved. The legislative proposal which I am sponsoring for the solving thereof is embodied in the bill H. R. 124. My speech is a brief explanation of that measure.

The speech is as follows:

A LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL FOR STABILIZATION

I note from the program that my colleagues, Mr. STRONG and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, as well as myself, have been assigned the subject Legislative proposals for stabilization, so I assume that each of us are expected to discuss briefly the legislative proposals we have sponsored for the past two or three years and with which our names have become identified.

First let me say that I believe that one of the great needs of our country and the world is the general stabilization of the buying power of money. I therefore favor any move that will tend to bring it about. It is needless to discuss before an audience of this kind the many evils incident to a fluctuating price level, for they are known to all of you. Relief therefrom would stabilize business conditions, would protect the rights of creditors as well as debtors, would largely assure capital and labor a square deal, and avoid many of our serious industrial and social conflicts. Entertaining these views, I naturally approve all efforts made by my friend Mr. STRONG, who follows me on this program, whose purpose it is to instruct the Federal Reserve Board to so conduct its functions as to assist in maintaining a stable price level. I am, however, also interested in going further and procuring legislation which would absolutely insure a stable price level. Whether that can best be accomplished by enacting the bill I am sponsoring or some other is for Congress and the public to decide.

The plan embodied in the Burtness bill rests on the simple theory that the buying power of money varies directly with the magnitude of its units and inversely with their number. This you will note is but an expansion of the classic quantity theory of money, which, variously stated, asserts in effect that "other things remaining unchanged, the buying power of money varies inversely as its quantity." With this old quantity theory our weight-adjustment plan does not, therefore, conflict, for obviously other things do not remain unchanged if the dollar's gold weight is altered.

In other words, H. R. 124 is based on the theory of effecting stabilization by means of changing the weight of the gold-bullion dollar to counteract accordingly the changes from time to time in the actual value of gold itself as measured by its true value—its buying power in other commodities. It recognizes the simple fact that gold, like any other commodity, may vary in value, hence in valure, from time to time, depending upon its supply, the cheapness with which it may be obtained, and other economic causes.

We do not claim that this is a new thought or idea. It is one that has been discussed by leading economists for decades. Let me quote a few sentences from an article from the pen of Simon Newcomb which appeared in the North American Review in 1879:

"The main point is that there is no reason why a standard dollar containing a fixed weight of the precious metal should remain of invariable value, but that, on the contrary, we have every reason to suppose that its value does fluctuate. * * * That a standard of value with the use of which no such thing as general fluctuations in price should be possible is one of the greatest social desiderata of our day no one will deny. * * * All we want is a dollar of uniform value as measured by the average of commodities. * * * The most obvious method of attaining the object is to issue a paper currency which shall be redeemable not in gold dollars of fixed weight but in such quantities of gold and silver bullion as shall suffice to make the required purchases."

No person in the world has done as effective work in familiarizing the public with this general theory as has Dr. Irving Fisher, and I am greatly pleased that we will to-night have the opportunity of hearing him discuss these important problems from his wealth of study and experience.

The specific plan I am sponsoring was formulated in a general way by a western student of the problem, Mr. Dana J. Tinnes, now a resident of Grand Forks, N. Dak., as early as 1896. Its broad general purposes are the same as the Fisher plan embodied in the Goldsborough bill. Both plans contemplate effecting stabilization by varying the weight of gold in the dollar. In many essentials, however, they are at variance. The proponents of the Burtness bill hold to the view that retail prices are based on wholesale prices, so that tendencies toward change in the retail prices can be measured each day by comparing the day's wholesale prices of all commodities with those of the preceding day and averaging their deviations. The bill accordingly proposes replacement of our one-commodity standard by an all-commodity standard, based on all the commodities on the wholesale market. It employs, therefore, not an index based on certain commodities, but an all-commodity market gauge. We also believe that it is not sufficient to correct maladjustments by occasional changes, annually, bimonthly, or at stated intervals. We desire not small, jerky changes in the price level, but a stable one, hence propose to block the tendency toward change by daily adjustments of the weight of the bullion dollar. Requiring daily adjustments and using a market gauge including all commodities properly weighted are provisions not found, to my knowledge, in any other legislation.

The bill creates a monetary standard division in the Treasury Department to handle construction of the all-commodity unit which is to be the standard of value, and to measure daily the tendency toward change in the price level and block such changes by adjustments of the mint rate. The market gauge is a simple index or gauge of the wholesale market level which shows inversely the daily changes in the buying power of the dollar. Agents are to be employed by the division to ascertain at the close of each business day the ruling wholesale prices in the various markets of the country, which information will be wired to the division. With this information the deviation of the current dollar will be shown. The task of establishing the new mint rate then becomes merely a matter of simple multiplicatiaon. We feel that the whole process when established will involve little or no more work and expense than do the daily weather reports.

Provision is made for revising the weightings quarterly. This is to be done on information or trade data furnished direct by the wholesaler on simple forms provided for the purpose. The entire market gauge schedule is to be checked up and necessary revision made annually.

Coinage of gold coins and silver dollars is stopped, and gold and silver minted into bars. Most of the gold in the Treasury is already in that form. A new issue of Treasury notes replaces all Government issues, but not the Federal reserve currency. These new Treasury notes will be stable in value, and should therefore be even more desirable in bank reserves than the metal.

Redemption funds are consolidated and interest-bearing bonds deposited to bring the total reserve, gold, silver, and bonds, up to 100 per cent of the Government money outstanding against it. Par stage for the metallic part of the reserve is gold 40 per cent and silver 10 per cent of the notes outstanding, the silver being valued at its current market price. The Bank of England has not taken advantage of its option to carry a fifth of its reserve in silver, probably because the silver would have to be valued at an obsolete ratio to gold.

The provision for issue of additional notes under certain conditions is so framed that it can not cause inflation but can and will prevent the contraction of which the falling mint rate is a warning. Their issue at certain times thus assists the stabilization process.

There are also provisions for protection of the gold reserve which, I may remark, will be no more needed with the dollar stabilized than at present. I perhaps need not emphasize, therefore, that the proposal does not in any way savor of "greenbackism" or any other scheme of fiat money.

Aside from recognition of the fundamental theory that the buying power of money varies directly with the magnitude of its units, and putting that theory into practical effect to stabilize prices, the purpose constantly borne in mind in the bill is stabilization through prevention of change. It naturally follows that the price stage existing at the time stabilization takes effect should be the mark to which the wholesale price level is thereafter to be held. Stabilizing on any other than the current price level would cause a change at the start more or less disturbing to business. If our purpose were accomplished, stabilization would appear in its true light as not change but prevention of change, just like the hourly electrical adjustment of clocks by the Western Union to Naval Observatory time.

To make this truly a prevention of change we deem it necessary to include all commodities of commerce properly weighted and to make the adjustments daily. We concede that selecting a relatively few articles are straws in the wind showing the tendency of the price level, but they are only straws in the wind and not a scientific determination. We hold that no index of a part can correctly register the movements of the whole.

The experience of the Bureau of Labor Statistics would seem to bear this out. Its index number was started in 1900 with 250 unweighted commodities. In 1914 the great advance in weighting the commodities was made and the number was increased to 297. By 1921 it was considered necessary to increase the number to 404, and in August, 1927, a further increase to 550 was deemed advisable. Until recently, at least, there has also been a lack of up-to-date weightings. The data of sales for 1909 was used from 1914 to 1921. From then until August, 1927, the weights were based on data for 1919. Last August weights were calculated from sales for the years 1923 to 1925. This is a most remarkable advance in a short time toward securing an accurate index so that the purchasing power of money may be correctly measured. Perfection thereof, however, can only come with the inclusion of all commodities and with weightings that are strictly current.

We do not want spasmodic or occasional adjustments of the price level which we think would be the result if adjustments were made only every few months or at stated intervals. In other words, the alternate pushing of prices up and the pulling of them down to a certain level, while preferable to present conditions, is not the object ultimately desired. Daily tendencies toward change can be scientifically measured and blocked by corresponding change in the weight of the dollar. Let me repeat, the plan is intended to prevent change and therefore daily adjustments are deemed necessary.

We do not deny that much can be done toward stabilization by regulating the volume of money and credits in use. We concede that within certain limits the powers of the Federal Reserve Board are such that acute fluctuations can be mitigated when those powers are exercised intelligently and wisely, although at times a degree of intelligence and foresight not possessed by humans would probably be required. As already indicated, we are in sympathy with the Strong bill, but we note that representatives of the Federal Reserve Board state that for several years now the board has attempted to avoid serious disturbances of the price level. We have, however, not had stability. From January, 1926, to January, 1927, as shown by the index number of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the price level declined from 156 to 146.9, or about 6 per cent. The index for June, 1927, was 143.7, while October, 1927, shows it at 150.1, or an increase in the price level in a four-month period of 6.4 points, or about 4½ per cent. It may well be doubted whether a better showing than this will be shown in the future by this method alone.

Change in the magnitude of the units of money affects their buying power much more promptly than does change in their number. If this statement is accepted as sound and if it is practical to obtain information each day showing any tendency toward change in the price level, then it follows that the plan proposed in the Burtness bill would operate almost automatically; in fact, the administration thereof would be so simple as to be "foolproof." We hope that in submitting it for public consideration we have contributed something worth while toward the promotion of stabilization. Kindly permit me to bespeak for it your earnest and sympathetic study.

THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there has been much discussion in both Houses of Congress, in the press, and in other places regarding the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution. I desire to give notice that I purpose on next Monday morning, as soon as the routine morning business is concluded, to deliver an address on the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I present a petition signed by citizens of Williamsburg, Va., regarding the storage of explosives at Yorktown. It is not a very long petition, and for the information of the Senate I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Virginia in the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, the undersigned residents of the city of Williamsburg, Va., respectfully call your attention to the fact that the United States of America during the period of the war activities acquired a tract of land of about 10,000 acres lying between Williamsburg and Yorktown for the purpose, as stated at that time, of establishing a Navy mine depot.

Your petitioners understood the term "Navy mine depot" to mean a place for the storage and handling of explosives needed for the current use of the Navy; and the amount of high explosives necessary for said purpose, your petitioners are informed, is very small.

Since the establishment of said Navy mine depot the Government has found itself in the possession of large quantities of high explosives consisting of T. N. T. and other high explosives, and your petitioners are informed that they have now stored on this tract of land about 22,000,000 pounds of T. N. T., some of which is in the storehouses already built upon said property, some in the open; and that new buildings are contemplated for the purpose of making this a permanent storage.

Your petitioners realize the fact that it is necessary for the Government to have a certain amount of high explosives on hand, and that some place should be allotted for this purpose. And your petitioners would not object to this area being used as a Navy mine depot, as originally contemplated, but from information that they have the said tract of land is being changed and set aside as a place for the storage of large quantities of high explosives, and that some of the storage buildings now on said property, and others that are contemplated being erected, are within 2,800 feet of the outside property line and not a much greater distance from the only main highway that there is leading down this peninsula from Williamsburg to Newport News.

Your petitioners, also being informed that Congress is now undertaking to definitely decide about some permanent arrangement for the storage of high explosives, respectfully request that you will carefully investigate the tract of land in question. And that if upon an investigation it is found that it would be a detriment for this section of the country for the storage of such large quantities of high explosives that arrangements will be made for the removal of the excess amount of high explosives on said tract of land—if it should be shown that there is an excess—and that proper action be taken to guard the safety of the lives and the property of the people living in this community.

While your petitioners hardly think it necessary, still, they call your attention to the fact that this peninsula is the most historic portion of the United States; that large numbers of tourists are daily visiting this community; that this is not a sparsely settled country, but the historic town of Yorktown lies to the east of this Navy mine depot; that the city of Williamsburg lies to the west and is not more than 3½ miles from the western limits of the Navy mine depot; and that besides the residents of the city of Williamsburg there are two State institutions; namely, the Eastern State Hospital, containing in the neighborhood of 1,000 inmates, and the College of William and Mary, with about 1,200 students.

In consideration of the foregoing facts your petitioners urge that the Navy mine depot at Yorktown be not converted into a place for storage of high explosives in large quantities; that such storage constitutes a continuing menace and operates to retard the growth and prosperity of the community.

Respectfully submitted.

There being no objection, the brief was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Brief for investigation of Americans' concessions abroad by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, as provided in Senate Resolution 47, by Mr. WHEELER, submitted by the Anti-Monopoly League, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C.

1. Location of natural resources does not give any prima facie right to hoard or monopolize them.

In an aide memoire of our State Department of January 6, 1909, inviting Mexico and Canada to send delegates to a conservation conference held here in February of that year the statement is made:

"The people of the whole world are interested in the natural resources of the whole world, benefited by their conservation, and injured by their destruction. The people of every country are interested in the supply of food and of material for manufacture in every other country, not only because these are interchangeable through processes of trade, but because a knowledge of the total supply is necessary to the intelligent treatment of each nation's share of the supply.

"Nor is this all. A knowledge of the continuance and stability of perennial and renewable resources is no less important to the world than a knowledge of the quantity or the term remaining for the enjoyment of those resources which when consumed are irreplaceable. As to all the great natural sources of national welfare, the peoples of to-day hold the earth in trust for the peoples to come after them. Reading the lessons of the past aright, it would be for such a conference to look beyond the present to the future."

Although first steps were taken toward calling an international conference on the allocation of natural resources, it was not held.

2. Americans have secured control of natural resources in many parts of the world and are constantly striving to secure additional resources.

Americans control or own valuable natural resources, or have concessions, in nearly all important Central and South American countries, including Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Venezuela, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Mexico. They have interests in Mesopotamia, Turkey, Russia, many parts of Africa, and elsewhere. They are the great financial power in Cuba, Haiti, and Porto Rico.

Americans' private investments abroad total about $14,000,000,000 and are increasing very rapidly. Much of these investments are in concessions for developing oil fields and mineral resources, construction work, and plantation development.

3. Concessions secured through fraud, force, or misrepresentation are a source of international friction, endanger legitimate investments, and are an incentive to war.

Prof. Charles Hodges, director division oriental commerce, New York University, has stated the situation tersely:

"In its broadest sense a concession is nothing more or less than a contract entered into by two parties for the performance of a specified purpose on terms which have been freely entered into and designed to confer mutual advantages. Unlike undertakings to which both parties are private interests, the concession becomes an outstanding phase of modern international relations because of the inequality between the parties to such an agreement. Unless the concession is granted by one government to another government, there is an essential inequality between the parties. This is typical of the general run of rights, so that the relationship between the parties to the understanding is that of two wholly different interests—one the sovereign state, subject only to the dictates of international law as a member of the community of nations, and the other the subject of another such sovereign state which itself may be involved only indirectly through its own nationals in such an undertaking.

"Concession diplomacy may be set down as the root of the evil in Abyssinia, China, or Nicaragua. It may be described as the economic side of the political struggles of industrial nations; as a commercial undertaking in which a business proposition is made into a political deal; as a private enterprise transformed into a diplomatic stake. The foreign office, not the business man, becomes the custodian of the equities involved.

"In other words, it is not the fact of business development overseas which is sinister, but the political implications put behind this economic expansion."

Also:

"Until the peoples of nations deal with the larger aspects of foreign policy in truly democratic terms, it seems to me that the whole question of the control of concession diplomacy is elusory. It is part and parcel of so much more vast a problem that it can not be detached from the greater political setting. In a word, to take the danger out of concessions is to remove the menace which attaches in a far larger degree to the whole trend of present-day diplomacy."

4. Concessions are in the nature of franchises or charters, which in the United States are matters of public record.

Among the most important acts of legislation in America are those requiring that before public franchises and charters are granted there must be investigation and public records, and empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon the issuance of securities by railroads. These acts are based upon the superior rights of the public to those of investors. Concessions granted by a government of a foreign country to an American citizen to exploit a natural resource are of an even more important public nature, because they involve greater difficulty in adjudication of differences of intent or interpretation than obtains at home because of the greater difficulty in bringing the matter in dispute before a competent court satisfactory to both parties.

A charter or franchise for operation of a natural resource, railroad, or public utility, moreover, is granted between more nearly equals—the governmental agency and the financial interests. A "concession" is granted by the Government to the citizen of a powerful nation in the case of the United States.

5. The United States, controlling two-fifths of the world's mineral resources, doing two-fifths of the world's work, and having about the same proportion of the world's wealth, is an object of hatred or envy in most countries of the world. It can not afford to permit unrestrained selfishness of a few citizens to involve it in warfare which can be localized only with great difficulty.

Dr. C. K. Leith, of Wisconsin University, in the October issue of Foreign Affairs, summarizes the relation of natural resources to production and wealth as follows:

"The United States originates and controls about 40 per cent of the world's mineral production, and the United States and Great Britain together control at least 75 per cent.

"By reason of their exploitation of power resources—coal, oil, gas, and water—the north Atlantic countries, counting both man power and mineral power, are doing annually five times the mechanical work of the combined total of Russia, China, and India, the three most populous countries of the world, though the population of the north Atlantic countries is only a third as great. With a fifth of the world's population, this group of countries is doing about two-thirds of the world's work. The United States alone is doing about 40 per cent of the world's work, and its next nearest competitor, Great Britain, about a quarter as much as the United States.

"This perspective reflects more or less the distribution of national wealth and the prevailing standards of living, as might be expected from the fact that wealth is essentially a product of work."

Doctor Leith further comments accurately:

"We are therefore witnessing the conflict of two powerful opposing forces—on the one hand, world demand for raw materials, which knows no national boundaries and which is forcing cooperation in order that demand may be efficiently satisfied; on the other, the nationalistic forces, directed toward partitioning resources for national gain or security. Many recent international episodes are an expression of this problem, and more are in store."

6. The development and growth of great manufacturing interests demands greater community of interest with respect to natural resources and raw materials.

In 1920 the International Miners' Congress adopted the following resolution: "That there be constituted within a brief period an international office for the distribution of fuel, ores, and other raw materials indispensable for the revival of normal economic life." The League of Nations, through its economic committee, and the economic conferences have given consideration to this problem, and the last economic conference approved the principle of an international allocation of natural resources.

7. The necessity for an equitable allocation of the world's natural resources is recognized in one of the most practical of the famous "fourteen points":

"The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance."

It was also stressed by President Wilson in his reply to the Pope's peace note, in which he stated:

"The American people * * * believe that peace should rest upon the rights of peoples * * * great or small, weak or powerful—their equal rights to freedom and security and self-government, and to a participation upon fair terms in the economic opportunities of the world."

It is obvious that there can not be such "participation upon fair terms in the economic opportunities of the world," with the United States controlling 40 per cent and Great Britain 35 per cent—together three-quarters of the mineral resources of the world and using them to crush the rest of the world commercially. Nearly all wars have sprung, in the last analysis, from trade rivalries and desire to secure natural resources.

8. Secret concessions, secretly arrived at by Americans in conjunction with weak or corrupt Government officials, intimidated by the background of America's unlimited financial and military power, are a repudiation of every declared purpose of the United States in entering the World War, stamp us as hypocrites, and embitter the world against us.

The vigorous opposition to an investigation of America's concessions and making a public record thereof is the best and most conclusive proof that this should be done.

America's entrance into the League of Nations or her adherence to the World Court, or both, are relatively unimportant compared with America's policy even as an "isolationist" Nation upon basic economic and fiscal policies. Should she challenge the rest of the world to an equitable and just policy with respect to natural resources controlled by American nationals, by example, no power could withstand this. A public investigation of American concessions abroad and repudiation by the Government of sanction for any concessions obtained fraudulently, by threat of force, illegality, corruptly or unmorally, would be more effective in insuring peace than adoption of any resolution outlawing war, or starting a Navy program to cost up to $1,000,000,000.

The test of America's integrity and sincerity in entering the World War is her intelligence and actions in ending the economic causes of war—of which looting of natural resources in backward countries is first.

The motion was agreed to.

CASPER-ALCOVA RECLAMATION PROJECT

Mr. PHIPPS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1136) to provide for the storage for diversion of the waters of the North Platte and construction of the Casper-Alcova reclamation project, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and ordered to be printed.

SETTLEMENT OF ALIEN PROPERTY CLAIMS

Mr. MAYFIELD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. DIRECTION AS TO THREE CARGO SERVICES

Mr. JONES submitted a resolution (S. Res. 116), which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Whereas the United States Shipping Board has heretofore established under the direction of the merchant marine act three lines of cargo services from American Pacific ports to ports in the Orient, one operating out of California, one out of Oregon, and one out of Washington; and

Whereas these established lines have been built up during the past four years at an aggregate expense of over $4,000,000, exclusive of the cost of the vessels employed in such services, to where said lines are now practically self-sustaining; and

Whereas the Shipping Board has determined to sell said three lines contemporaneously for private operation, under specifications and conditions which will make it impossible for any person or group of persons primarily interested in any one line as an individual unit, to purchase and permanently maintain said line; and

Whereas under said specifications as prepared and advertised, the bidding will be confined to persons or groups of persons desiring to acquire and maintain all three lines as a composite unit, thereby destroying the integrity of the lines as heretofore established; and

Whereas no intending purchaser can safely bid for a line as an individual unit without having entered into a combination with intending purchasers of other lines; and

Whereas the specifications published by the Shipping Board will necessarily exclude from competitive bidding persons entitled to become purchasers and will confine the bidding to persons and groups who have arranged monopolistic control of cargo shipping on the Pacific, all of which will result in inadequate prices for said services and in depriving the separate communities primarily interested in each line from becoming the owner and operator of that line, thereby preventing such individual communities from building up their trade and manufactures dependent upon oriental shipping; and

Whereas the sale of the lines under specifications as now advertised will inevitably result in a monopoly of shipping between American ports and the Orient: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board is requested and directed to proceed no further with the proposed sale of the three cargo services between American and oriental ports under the conditions and specifications now advertised for the reception of bids on February 10, 1928, and that such advertisement be withdrawn and canceled, and, further, that new specifications be prepared after full opportunity of interested persons to be heard, which will enable any community primarily interested in any of the three lines to submit bids with such guarantees of protection as will enable such purchaser to maintain the line, and that such specifications of sale shall conform in all respects to the provisions of the merchant marine act.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF SOUTHERN RECLAMATION CONFERENCE

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 117), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the Southern Reclamation Conference held in Washington, D. C., December 14 and 15, 1927, under the auspices of the Department of the Interior, Hubert Work, Secretary, and of the Bureau of Reclamation, Elwood Mead, Commissioner, be printed with illustrations as a Senate document.

LANDS IN HARRISON COUNTY, MISS.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1425) to remove a cloud on title. The bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. It relates to certain lands in Harrison County, Miss. A similar bill passed both the Senate and the House at the last session, but did not reach the President in time to be signed by him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks immediate consideration of Senate bill 1425, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States hereby relinquishes all the right, title, and interest of the United States acquired by virtue of a marshal's deed dated August 21, 1848, in the following-described property situated in Harrison County, Miss., to wit: The west half southwest quarter section 30, township 7 south, range 10 west, and east half southeast quarter section 25, township 7 south, range 11 west, lying south of Bernards Bayou and containing about 150 acres.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi if the bill will lead to any debate?

Mr. STEPHENS. I think not. As I said, a similar bill passed both the Senate and the House at the last session, but it failed to reach the President in time for his signature.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER-POWER RESOURCES OF TENNESSEE

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very important letter addressed to me by the members of the Railroad and Public Utilities Commission of the State of Tennessee in regard to the methods of utilizing water power in that State.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF TENNESSEE,
Nashville, January 11, 1928.

Hon. L. D. TYSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your favor of December 27, 1927, addressed to the Railroad and Public Utilities Commission of Tennessee, we respectfully submit the following as the attitude of the commission with respect to the questions mentioned in your letter:

It is a matter of common knowledge that Tennessee is very rich in water-power resources. This commission has keenly felt the great necessity of preserving and protecting the rights of the State at the very beginning of the development of these resources. It is the opinion of the attorney general of the State of Tennessee, as well as of this commission and of its counsel, that the State of Tennessee has invested this commission with power and authority to act in the premises. Having sought the advice of the attorney general and having fully and thoroughly considered the matter, on October 10, 1927, the commission passed an order, which was duly entered upon its minutes, copy of which order is herewith transmitted for your information as to its contents. This order states as clearly as the commission and the attorney general and its counsel can do the attitude, position, and contention of this commission with respect to the matters embraced in the order.

Thereafter, on November 1, 1927, the commission made a further order, after having cited various applicants for water-power rights to appear before it on that date, copy of which order is also transmitted to you herewith. This order also has the approval of the attorney general for the State and of the counsel for the commission.

Pursuant to the powers lodged in this commission by statute in Tennessee, as the commission has been advised by the attorney general and its counsel, the commission prepared a form of application to be used by applicants for water-power sites, which form indicates the views entertained by the commission with respect to its powers and duties. A copy of same is likewise transmitted to you herewith. This form of application was ready for distribution about the 1st of December last, and was mailed to the various prospective applicants for water-power sites. Up to the present time no formal application has been received by the commission.

Within the last few days a suit has been filed in the chancery court at Nashville by the Tennessee Eastern Electric Co., which challenges the power of the commission, under the statutes of the State, to take and exercise the powers and jurisdiction claimed by the commission and by the attorney general for the State, as shown in the various documents hereinbefore mentioned and herewith transmitted. This bill in chancery also challenges the right and jurisdiction of the State itself with respect to the control over the development of water-power sites in Tennessee. It may be that the recent suit will have the effect of delaying the development of water-power sites in this State until the courts shall have finally acted upon the legal and constitutional questions raised in this bill. Since this bill undertakes to raise questions with respect to the alleged violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution by the action already taken by this commission, it is possible that the case may ultimately be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Should this be done, we fear that the development of the water-power resources of the State will be materially retarded. It is the sincere desire of the commission that everything possible be done to promote and hasten the development of the water-power resources of this State, provided always that in so doing the rights of the State and of its people be fully protected against exploitation on the part of those who are now seeking to secure these very valuable rights. The commission is ready and anxious at any time hereafter to afford to every applicant a prompt hearing and speedy determination of all questions raised in applications for water-power sites in Tennessee, and it here and now desires to make it clear that any delay in the development of the water-power resources of the State shall not be laid at the door of this commission.

Replying to that part of your letter wherein you indicate some solicitude as to what effect the settlement of the question with respect to Muscle Shoals would have upon the granting of permits by the commission, it is respectfully suggested that the action of Congress upon the question of the disposition made of Muscle Shoals may have a far-reaching effect—perhaps a controlling effect—upon the entire water-power development on the Tennessee River above Muscle Shoals. We are trusting to you, and to Tennessee's other representatives in both Houses of the Congress, to protect and safeguard the rights of the State with respect to all these vast water-power resources above Muscle Shoals. Should such legislation be enacted by the Congress as to make all the other water-power sites on the Tennessee River above Muscle Shoals merely subordinate to or dependent upon the development at Muscle Shoals, in our opinion untold losses would result to the people of Tennessee and to the State in its sovereign capacity. The commission views with alarm the possibility of the passage of such legislation as is represented by the Madden bill, so far as it attempts to interfere with the rights of the State of Tennessee through this commission to control and make disposition to independent companies of power sites on the Tennessee River or elsewhere within the boundaries of this State. This commission regards any attempt on the part of Congress to dispose of water-power sites within the boundaries of the respective States, independent of the action of the State, as an unwarranted invasion of the sovereignty of the State and an unconstitutional usurpation of the rights of the States and the peoples thereof.

You inquire about how the commission is getting along with its proposition of making a charge for electricity generated by hydroelectric companies within the State of Tennessee, and express your approval of the underlying principle upon which the commission has based its action. The commission is gratified to know that you feel that it is "moving along the right line." For the reasons above set out, we may say that nothing has been done as yet, although the commission hopes that as soon as litigation is cleared away it may have an opportunity to put this principle into effect. At this point it should be stated that if the commission is allowed to go forward and require a reasonable charge per kilowatt-hour for electricity generated by the use of the State's valuable water-power resources, a substantial sum would be raised annually and turned into the treasury of the State to lighten the burdens of taxation and debt which in recent years have grown very heavy. Such a charge is in no sense a tax upon the utility which enjoys the privilege of using the water power of the State, which belongs to its people and to the State in its sovereign capacity, but, on the other hand, is only compensation to the State and its people for a valuable property right which the State as sovereign owns and which it fully protects by its laws in its capacity as trustee for the people. It is nothing more nor less than a lease charge, just such as the Federal Government proposes to exact for Muscle Shoals, or the State for any other State project. If the State should voluntarily and gratuitously confer upon the various corporations seeking to secure these valuable water-power sites the unqualified and unlimited power to develop them in their own way and without approval and supervision from any department of the State government, and if these companies should then be permitted to write into the rate base upon which is predicated the rate which they may charge for their products sold to the people of the State, the element of water-power value at an enormous sum, measured by the difference in the cost of generating electricity by the use of coal and steam on the one hand and by water power on the other, it would result in levying a tax, in effect, upon the people of Tennessee aggregating millions of dollars annually and this commission feels that it would be false to its trust and recreant to its duty if it did not stand steadfastly for the rights of the people in the face of such tremendous possibilities. This is one of the questions raised in the recent suit above referred to. It is one of the propositions upon which this commission has planted its feet and proposes to stand to the bitter end.

In your letter you have very kindly invited the commission to state its position with respect to the several bills that have been introduced in Congress, and in reply to this paragraph we desire to state that a bill has been prepared along the lines of the McKellar-Garrett bill introduced in the last Congress, copy of which is herewith transmitted for your information, since this bill states clearly and definitely the attitude of the commission upon the subjects embraced therein. This bill has the approval of the attorney general of the State of Tennessee, and was prepared under the direction of the commission and its counsel. Copies of this bill have been submitted to Senator McKELLAR, Hon. FINIS GARRETT, and Hon. CORDELL HULL. The commission would appreciate it if you would confer with the above-named gentlemen in regard to this bill.

Your inquiry as to what should be done in regard to the regulation of rates on power that comes into the State from other States, and power going out of this State into other States, is timely and important. It seems to the commission that one of the most important questions for the consideration of Congress is the enactment of legislation conferring upon some body, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, power to regulate interstate rates for electric energy, just as has been done with respect to the regulation of passenger and freight rates on railroads, and rates on telephone and telegraph companies, etc. There would be no more danger of a conflict of authority in the regulation of interstate and intrastate rates on electricity than there is in the regulation of freight and passenger rates on railroads and other such subjects as have been covered by Federal and State legislation.

If Congress should fail to make any provision for the regulation of interstate rates on electricity, hydroelectric companies in one State might transmit their energy to other States and charge enormous rates and thus deprive the State where the energy was generated of all right and power to regulate it and also deprive it of the benefit of the energy developed within its own borders. Take the State of Tennessee as an illustration: It is rich in water-power resources. If the power sites are all taken up and developed electricity may be sent out of the State and sold at such prices as the generating companies may fix, and the State would thereby be deprived of the benefits which would flow from the industrial development of this State; that is, manufacturing towns might be built up in Kentucky and Alabama rather than in Tennessee, and thus the people of the State would lose the full benefit of these valuable resources, in which the State as a sovereign has a clear and undoubted property right. Will the representatives of the people of Tennessee, whether in Congress or within the State, sit idly by and see the people lose this priceless heritage?

Again, in the absence of statutory regulation of interstate rates on electric energy, should the hydroelectric companies for any reason desire to do so, they might sell their power to the consumers in another State for less than the cost of production and recoup the losses thus sustained by the imposition of higher rates on consumers in Tennessee. For instance, they might organize subsidiary companies, manufacturing and otherwise, located in other States to which they might desire to sell (in a technical sense) their output at a mere nominal rate and at a substantial loss and thus evade the State of Tennessee and ignore its rights. Should such generating company be thus allowed to sell power to nonresident consumers at a loss, which would be reflected in its net rate on its entire operation, and then appear before this commission and demand the right to fix rates within the State sufficient to recoup losses sustained on interstate business, the commission does not see any escape from the result which would thus inevitably follow, which is that the commission would have to either fix rates high enough to cover such losses—because the commission would have no control over its interstate transactions—and rates would have to be imposed upon the people of Tennessee which would necessarily and intentionally be excessive or else the company would resort to the courts upon an allegation that the State rates were confiscatory and thus compel an increase in the rates to consumers within the State.

The entire subject is one of the most important, if not the most important, economic and legal problem now confronting the people of America. It involves the property rights of the people of the several States and likewise, which is perhaps even more important, involves the fundamental principles of State sovereignty and of the rights of the States to control and make disposition of their own resources. Legislation is needed by the Congress defining the limitations of the Federal power with the Constitution of the United States. Congressional legislation is also needed to authorize and require some rate-making body to fix and regulate rates upon electricity transmitted from one State to another. The various States of the Union will then find a clear field for the enactment of such legislation as will protect and safeguard the rights of their States and of their peoples.

The commission desires to thank you for the consideration shown it and to assure you that it will appreciate your cooperation and assistance, and that the people of Tennessee are alive and awake to this siutation and are watching with interest the efforts of their Representatives in Congress to secure legislation that will protect them and their posterity.

We beg to remain,

Sincerely yours,

HARVEY H. HANNAH.
PORTER DUNLAP.

TAX REFUNDS

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 110. I have been asked by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and by other Senators to let the resolution go over and I have done so three or four times. It is very necessary that the Treasury Department may get to work on the names in order that it may furnish the list called for by the resolution to the Senate and the House of Representatives before the measure to which it relates comes up.

Mr. HALE. The consideration of the resolution will require some debate, will it not?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think not.

Mr. MOOT. I wish to make a statement in regard to the resolution, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think it will lead to any debate.

Mr. HALE. In view of the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I hope the Senator from Alabama will not ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I shall call up the resolution later.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE THE SINKING OF THE SUBMARINE "S–4"

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4, and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senate took a recess on yesterday, and the request to have the unfinished business, Senate bill 744, temporarily laid aside continues without any further suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the resolution (H. J. Res. 131) which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 5, page 3, line 2, after the word "duties," to insert "in such amounts and for such items of expense incident to the official duties as the commission in its discretion may authorize, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or accounting requirements"; in line 9, after the word "expended," to insert "for the purposes of this resolution"; and in line 13, after the word "commission," to strike out "which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office in such amounts and for such purposes incident to its duties as the commission in its discretion may deem proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number; they shall serve without compensation as such, but shall be paid out of the amount appropriated their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties, in such amounts and for such items of expense incident to the official duties as the commission in its discretion may authorize, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or accounting requirements. Nothing herein shall reduce the pay or allowances of the commissioners selected from the Navy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $20,000, to be expended for the purposes of this resolution by such officer of the Supply Corps of the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission. The President is authorized, upon request of the commission, to designate such personnel of any department or Government establishment, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 3, line 23, after the word "than," to strike out "May 15, 1928," and to insert "March 15, 1928"; in line 24, before the word "report," to insert the word "full"; in the same line, after the word "President," to strike out "who shall" and to insert "respecting that portion of the investigation referred to in section 3 hereof, and the President shall immediately," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. The commission shall, as soon as practicable, but not later than March 15, 1928, submit a full report to the President respecting that portion of the investigation referred to in section 3 hereof, and the President shall immediately transmit the same and all other reports of said commission to Congress, giving the results of its investigation and its recommendations. All records of the commission, upon the completion of its duties, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the joint resolution, in order to have it pending, which I ask to have read at this time.

Mr. HALE. Very well, but I should like to make a statement about the joint resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Then, I shall withhold my amendment for the present.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, on the afternoon of the 17th of December last while coming to the surface just off the trial course near Provincetown, Mass., the submarine S–4 was run into by the United States Goast Guard destroyer Paulding and sunk in 105 feet of water, with a loss of 40 lives. We are familiar with the details of the disaster and with the tragic death of the six men who were shut up in the forward torpedo compartment of the submarine.

As I said when I introduced a similar joint resolution in the Senate, the country was stirred by this disaster as I have never known it to be disturbed by any other naval disaster since the sinking of the Maine in the harbor of Habana in 1898. The eyes of the country were on the Navy in its efforts to save those six men. They were not saved. A very natural feeling of indignation grew up in the country, a feeling that all could not be as it should be with our Navy.

Congress adjourned for the holidays before all hope had been abandoned. I returned to Washington just before Congress reconvened and called on the Secretary of the Navy. I found that he was just about to request the President to ask Congress for a sufficient appropriation to provide for a commission to make a thorough study of the question of safety appliances and methods used in the Navy in connection with submarines and to report its findings and recommendations for the future benefit of the Navy.

A naval court of inquiry had already been appointed, as the law provides. I told the Secretary of the Navy that it did not seem to me that this was sufficient; that the country would never be satisfied with a report made by the Navy itself. I suggested to him that to the functions of the commission which he was about to ask the President to appoint be added the function of making a full investigation into the facts concerning the sinking of the S–4. It seemed to me that combining the functions of the commission so that it would take into consideration and investigate not only devices for future security, but also the facts connected with the S–4 disaster was an ideal solution of the whole matter.

What we want to find out and what the country wants to find out regarding the S–4 disaster is whether the Navy was at fault or not at fault, and if it was at fault where does the blame lie. If the Navy was at fault it was because of one or more of several reasons:

First. Because the Navy did not supply adequate equipment and appliances to assure the safety of the men on board submarines! That is a matter purely for experts to decide.

Second. Because the S–4 was lacking in some of the necessary equipment. That is a matter also involved with the first reason and therefore would need expert opinion.

Third. Because it did not use proper precautions in the trial tests of the S–4.

Fourth. Because it did not use every means in its power to rescue the men imprisoned on the submarine. That, involving as it does the questions of salvage, is a matter for experts and for experts only. In other words, the men who are qualified to pronounce upon the question of safety appliances and upon the question of security in the Navy are preeminently the men to pronounce also upon the S–4 disaster.

The Secretary of the Navy told me that for the commission which he was about to ask the President to appoint he had already spoken to three civilian experts. The three men were:

John F. Stevens, civil engineer, New York City. I think the Senate is familiar with the record of Mr. Stevens. He was at one time engineer of the Panama Canal. He has occupied positions of trust and importance all over the country. He is president of the American Society of Civil Engineers. In 1925 he was awarded the Fritz medal for great achievement. He is one of the most prominent engineers in the country.

The second man named was W. R. Whitney, of Schenectady. Mr. Whitney is director of the research laboratory of the General Electric Co. He has been member of the United States Naval Consulting Board since 1915. That is the board of which Thomas A. Edison is president. He is a member of the National Research Council, a member of the National Academy of Sciences, fellow of the Academy of Arts and Sciences, and president of the American Chemical Society.

The third man was Mr. Thomas A. Scott. Mr. Scott has been in the salvage business all his life. At one time he was president of the Merritt, Scott & Chapman Co. He is still attached to that company as a consulting expert and is probably the leading authority on salvage operations in this country.

Those are the three experts to whom Secretary Wilbur had written to ascertain if they would act on the commission which he was about to ask the President to appoint, if so appointed by the President.

Of course, the President makes the appointments on the commission; but the Secretary had written to these men to ascertain whether they would serve if appointed, and they have agreed so to serve.

Mind you, Mr. President, these men were not asked to serve on a commission which was to act on the S–4 disaster. It can not be said by anyone, however hostile to this joint resolution, that this proposed commission of experts was a commission picked out to whitewash the Navy. Nothing of the sort was contemplated. All that they were to do was to go into the question of safety appliances to be used by the Navy for the future, and they were picked out on account of their great knowledge and their capacity for just this kind of work.

Besides these three, the Secretary was to recommend two naval officers. He considered that he should have one naval officer from the line and one from the construction corps.

I have drawn an amendment, and I now send it to the desk, which I think is of considerable importance. It was not recommended by the committee. I did not have a chance to take it up with the committee. Some objection has been raised to the appointment of a committee of civilian and naval experts, on the ground that it would not be able to handle this investigation and to examine the witnesses. I ask the clerk to read the amendment which I offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

four of whom shall be selected from civil life and one shall be a retired officer of the Navy. Of the four members selected from civil life, one shall be a United States circuit or district judge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I object to all of these amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is——

Mr. SWANSON. Is the Senator from Maine through?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SWANSON. We can not vote on amendments until he surrenders the floor. Let the amendment be pending. The Senator can not hold the floor and have his amendments adopted without discussion.

Mr. HALE. I had no intention of doing so. I desire to have the amendment voted on later.

Mr. SWANSON. Let it be withheld.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator desires to have the question put, he will yield the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if that amendment is agreed to and this commission is appointed, we shall have a commission with two engineers, men at the very head of their profession in the country, men in every way competent to deal with this question; one salvage expert, probably the leader in his line in the country; one Federal judge of the circuit or district court, whose whole training equips him to handle witnesses; and one naval officer—only one—whose naval knowledge will be an essential help, on the commission. I do not see how a fairer commission could possibly be appointed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me finish my statement?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Then I shall be glad to answer any questions.

I do not see how a fairer commission could possibly be appointed. I do not believe that a commission could be appointed that would have to a greater extent the confidence of the country.

In appointing it we do not give up any rights. Under the provisions of the joint resolution the commission has to report to the President, and he has to transmit their report to us immediately. Then we have to act upon it and decide whether or not we will adopt it. If we do not want to adopt it, or if we want to change it in any way, we are at full liberty to act; and, if it is necessary to do so, I am sure that we will act.

The Secretary of the Navy approved my suggestion with regard to combining the functions of the commission, and he took up the matter with the President, who also approved it.

On January 4 I introduced in the Senate a joint resolution similar to this one; and Mr. BUTLER, chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, introduced the House joint resolution. The House, after making a few minor amendments, sent the joint resolution over to the Senate. The House passed the joint resolution without a dissenting vote. The Committee on Rules, to whom the joint resolution was referred, approved it unanimously. The chairman of the Committee on Rules announced that the Naval Affairs Committee of the House approved the joint resolution. I will say that there was no record vote on the joint resolution in the House, but people who were there have informed me that no one voted against it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to state that several members of the House committee are not in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I did not say that the House committee was unanimous. I said that it approved the joint resolution.

The joint resolution came over here to the Senate, and the committee took up the matter. By a very close vote the joint resolution was approved by the committee. The committee made several amendments, four of which are minor ones which clarify to some extent the language about the auditing of accounts. The fifth amendment advances the date of the filing of the report on the S–4 disaster from May 15, as the House had it, to March 15. We did this because we thought that with the probability of Congress adjourning early in June, sufficient time would not be left to take up any matters in connection with the report or to go on with a Senate or congressional investigation if it was then deemed wise to do so.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will give me an opportunity to submit in a fair, impartial, and judicial way the issues presented in this matter.

As the Senator from Maine has said, this country was shocked and stirred as it has not been stirred since the Maine was sunk by the sinking of the S–4 and the efforts made to save the unfortunate people therein. Never have I seen people more stirred, more interested. The Navy Department ordered an investigation under the law, which the Secretary of the Navy or the President had a right to order, and which they have ordered, and the investigation is now being made. That investigation, however, is being made by a board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to report as to the derelictions of naval officers, and, as far as the Navy is concerned, where the responsibility, if any, lies.

Now, we have what proposition? That the Navy Department itself shall appoint a second board or commission to investigate and pass upon its own activities. In other words, this proposition is to constitute two commissions, to be named by the Secretary of the Navy, to investigate himself and his department.

I thought possibly the President would have some hand in the matter, but judging from the remarks made by the senior Senator from Maine this work has already been done. The Secretary of the Navy has already written letters requesting certain people named by him to investigate the action and conduct of his own department.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senator must have misunderstood what I said. I said that the Secretary of the Navy sounded out these men to see whether they would accept if they were appointed, with a view of recommending them to the President; and it must be borne in mind that he called them for another purpose than the investigation of the sinking of the S–4.

Mr. SWANSON. In other words, the Secretary of the Navy has already selected the court to pass upon the Navy Department in this matter.

Mr. HALE. But his department was not on trial before the commission he asked for.

Mr. SWANSON. I will get to that soon. I want to show the purpose in this scheme. I want to show how the Senate is insulted; I want to show how the House is insulted; how your power is taken from you and a scheme devised in order to prevent any fair, impartial, and just investigation of the Navy by Congress in connection with this frightful disaster.

What is the proposition? On the 4th of January the Secretary of the Navy wrote a letter to the President. On the 4th of January the President sent a message to Congress. On the 4th of January, the same day, the chairman of the two committees of the House and Senate introduced a joint resolution which is embodied in this proposition that the President, through the Secretary of the Navy, who had already performed the work for him, shall select men—two retired naval officers and civilians—to determine who was responsible for this unfortunate occurrence.

The Navy Department has appointed one court to inquire into it, the court of inquiry. That inquiry is being held now. Why should the Navy Department be authorized to appoint a second court of inquiry to investigate its own transactions and its own performance and its own responsibility in this matter? That is what this proposition does.

You never see a proposition like this that does not have around it something that makes it attractive. There are about 2,000 devices to improve submarines before the Navy Department. The Senate can not investigate them; so they offered a proposition originally intended to authorize the expenditure of $20,000 to have this investigation made by civilians, which was all right, and which I favor. The President himself, without any authorization of Congress, appointed a board known as the Aircraft Commission to investigate aircraft and report to Congress, and Congress afterwards paid the expenses. He had authority to do the same thing in this matter. There was no limitation on his authority; and if his contingent fund was not sufficient to pay it, Congress would have paid it. That was the original proposition, to which everybody agreed, and to which I agree; but in order to avert an impartial investigation of the S–4 disaster by Congress they attach to the joint resolution section 3, which provides that this same commission shall investigate all the facts, responsibilities, and occurrences in connection with the sinking of the S–4.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator say this would not be an impartial commission?

Mr. SWANSON. I say so; yes. I say that no jury is impartial when the man who is to be tried before it has the privilege of naming the jury.

Mr. HALE. Naming them for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. Let him name them for the purpose he has in mind, to ascertain what improvements are needed. What I condemn is that under section 3 the individual would appoint those who are to try his own responsibility.

Mr. HALE. As I said before, the Secretary of the Navy is not to name the men at all. He simply would suggest the names to the President.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator just told me that he has already written them and asked them to serve.

Mr. HALE. Certainly; but he would have no authority to appoint them.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator suppose the President would reject them unless he turned the Secretary of the Navy out? What is the scheme? On the 4th of January—all this was done in one day—the President rushed into it, rushed to send his message, rushed to Congress, and what was done in Congress when the matter was brought to the House of Representatives? It is improper to speak in one House with reference to what has been done in another; but since the Senator from Maine has stated what occurred in the House I will also. Here was something affecting the Navy. Here was a naval proposition, for the Naval Affairs Committee, but when it went to the House it was not referred to the Naval Affairs Committee. Oh, no! Differences might be precipitated there. It was referred to the Committee on Rules. The Naval Affairs Committee was deprived of its jurisdiction. The Committee on Rules is what is known as the partisan machine of the House. I have served there, and I know. This committee would take charge of it, and there they would have no discussion, and have no difference of opinion. The very fact that they would not let it go to the Naval Affairs Committee, the very fact that they would not let them consider it, the very fact that they turned it over to the partisan machine of the House shows the purpose in view.

What is my proposition? I ask that the clerk read it. I do not see how anybody can object to it. Let the joint resolution pass, but let us amend section 3. I hope the Senator will look at section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint committee composed of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry. And said joint committee shall submit a full report to each branch of the Congress, giving the result of this investigation and such recommendations as it may see proper to make.

On page 2, line 17, after the word "the," insert the words "joint committee and."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this would not interfere with the Navy Department at all in getting expert testimony and evidence and judgments in connection with improvements needed on submarines. I am not saying that the President is going to appoint the commission. He is going to name whomsoever the Secretary of the Navy recommends, and he has already made inquiry, and we have been told the names of people who will serve.

I say that when the derelictions of any man or his department are on trial and to be investigated, we ought to have fair, impartial investigators, not named by the man himself. I do not care how impartial these investigators are, I do not care how able they are, the whole Anglo-Saxon idea of jurisprudence is that a man shall not name the jury and judge who sit in his case.

The Navy Department has appointed one court of inquiry to investigate this disaster. Why should it appoint a second? There is no necessity for it. If it desires to have this information my amendment will enable them to get it.

We recall the aircraft investigation. In that case the President appointed one Senator and two Members of the House. This is the first time in my life I ever heard of Congress abdicating its privileges, abdicating its power of investigation, and consenting in a matter that shocked the country that the man and the department interested shall name the people to make the investigation.

I can recall that the suggestion was made in various papers, though it never was made in the shape of a resolution offered in Congress, when the naval oil reserves were involved in recent investigations, that the Navy Department should appoint some experts, civilians and Navy people, to look into the naval reserves and see what was wise to be done, and what had been done with them. Is there a Senator here who believes that if that course had been pursued, the fraud, the corruption, the rascality that were disclosed in connection with those naval reserves would ever have been run down and ascertained? If Congress had recreantly refused to discharge its responsibility and power and duty, and had turned the matter over to somebody else, Fall would have been saved, Daugherty would have been saved, and none of the fraud perpetrated in that connection in recent years would have been disclosed.

I protest against any procedure like this. It is but an entering wedge; to do what? To deprive Congress of its power of investigation, to deprive Congress of its power of initiating these investigations, simply giving Congress the power of approval or disapproval of what other people do.

I ask that three Members of the Senate be named by the Vice President, and three Members of the House be named by the Speaker, to investigate, not submarine appliances, not future needs, but to impartially place the responsibility in connection with this unfortunate accident, where it ought to be. Do you tell me there is politics in it? The Vice President is a Republican, and he would name a majority of that party. The Speaker is a Republican, and there could be no politics in it.

The only politics in it is an effort to have the Secretary of the Navy through the President, name a commission to investigate himself. I do not think that is right, I do not think it is proper, I do not think it would be the right kind of an investigation to start.

It is said that we can do this after the 15th of March. The proposal was to make the report returnable the 15th of May, but there was such a rebellion against that that it was changed to the 15th of March, and it was said that a report would come in by that time, and then Congress, if it was not satisfied, could make an investigation.

How is Congress ever going to be satisfied if it does not start the investigation now? The wreck is there, the evidence is being taken. To wait until April or May and then go back to the scene of this accident seems to me would be a fruitless and useless thing.

This committee ought to have been there at the beginning of the session of Congress. This committee ought to have been there and viewed this wreck. This committee ought to have been there to question the people concerned. This committee ought to have been there to place the responsibility where it ought to be, in a fair and just and honorable and fearless way, in connection with this unfortunate affair.

I have never criticized the Navy unjustly and unfairly. I have been criticized by people who said I was disposed to be too friendly to the Navy. But in this matter the Secretary of the Navy himself should have come and asked for an investigation, and should not have sent this letter to the President and then come to Congress in an effort to prevent somebody else than people directly or indirectly named by him making this investigation.

I have not criticized the Navy Department in this matter, and do not propose to until I get the facts. There has been too much unjust criticism of naval people and naval activities. I know that Japan has accidents almost equal in number to ours, and other nations do, too. We can not have this service without accidents. But when this country is shocked as it was when this accident occurred—as the Senator from Maine said, he never had seen the country so stirred—the country is entitled to an honest, fair, full, complete investigation, by people not named by the Secretary of the Navy, I do not care what their character is or what their reputation is. It is entitled to have somebody named by the Senate and named by the House to discharge their responsibility and their duty.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I was going to ask the Senator if he could tell me any other case where a Secretary of the Navy has come to Congress and asked for an investigation of a naval disaster?

Mr. SWANSON. Except this?

Mr. HALE. Any case where he has come before Congress and asked for an investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not remember any.

Mr. HALE. The Senator said the Secretary ought to have come to Congress and asked for an investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. He ought to have told the Senator that he hoped the Congress would investigate it, and if anybody in the Navy Department has done wrong, he should have said he wanted to know who they were, and to place the responsibility.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator recall any case where the Congress has investigated a naval disaster?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not. I remember that when I was chairman of the committee, whenever four or five Senators wanted an investigation of any kind, I gave it to them.

Mr. HALE. That is not my question.

Mr. SWANSON. And I generally found that the Navy was exonerated. The more it opposes an investigation the more I am for it.

Mr. HALE. My point is that this is an entirely new departure.

Mr. SWANSON. It is a new departure.

Mr. HALE. There never has been an investigation of an accident——

Mr. SWANSON. We investigated the sinking of the Titanic, and got good results.

Mr. HALE. That was not the Navy.

Mr. SWANSON. It was not the Navy, but the Committee on Commerce, when the Titanic sunk, investigated the accident. The committee investigated that in order to place the responsibility, and great improvements were made along the lines of safety of ships.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator let me finish my statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that there never has been an investigation by a committee of Congress of any naval disaster that I can find in the history of the Navy, with the exception of the investigation of the blowing up of the Maine in Habana Harbor. A resolution to investigate that disaster was introduced in Congress and was referred to the Naval Affairs Committee, but that committee did not take action on it. It referred the resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee. The Senator is objecting to this matter going to the Rules Committee of the House. The only similar case that has come up in naval history has been referred, not to the Naval Affairs Committee, but to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Of course they did not want to get the opinion of the Naval Affairs Committee on it. They wanted the partisan machine in the House to take charge of it and rush it through. The Senator says it never has been done. If it never has been done, it is time it ought to be done. We have heretofore been listening to the court of inquiry. If you are not going to investigate it, strike out section 3 and wait until the court of inquiry gets through. You knew the time had come when Congress was going to have an investigation of this in some way. We have had repeated accidents in the Navy that we have never investigated. I have not criticised any naval officer or any court of inquiry which has made any of these investigations, but this was so startling, so striking, that the Navy was satisfied a court of inquiry might not satisfy the country, so it fixed up a scheme to let the Secretary, through the President, name a second board to do the work when he already had the board named. All I ask is to strike out section 3 and let the resolution go through and let Congress determine the proper way to conduct this investigation.

I repeat, I do not care who the members of the commission are. I have respect for the Secretary of the Navy and a kind regard for him, but I do not think he ought to name the commission who are to pass on the responsibility, activities, or derelictions of his own department. Is is contrary to every principle of jurisprudence that the world has ever known.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. The Senator seems to ignore the point that these men are not to be selected in any way to act on the S–4 disaster.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator comes in and makes them do it to keep Congress from having an investigaiton. If they are not appointed for that purpose, let section 3 go out, and let the Senate and the House determine whether they will have an investigation or not. That is all I ask the Senator to do. Does the Senator consent to section 3 going out?

Mr. HALE. They were appointed because they were experts.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator consent to section 3 going out and letting the Senate and the House have an investigation?

Mr. HALE. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator consent that section 3 shall go out, and let the House and the Senate determine what they will do about an investigation?

Mr. HALE. Certainly not. The House has already decided what it will do.

Mr. SWANSON. Who? The Rules Committee, in the manner indicated by me, did it.

Mr. HALE. The Rules Committee could not adopt the resolution. The House itself acted.

Mr. SWANSON. Now let me discuss another phase of the matter. There were six destroyers wrecked about three or four years ago. There was no investigation of that matter by Congress. Three or four submarines have been destroyed and there has been no investigation. Now, everybody knew this matter was going to be investigated and not left entirely to the naval court of inquiry. Nobody has interfered with the investigation by the Secretary of the Navy through his court of inquiry. It is not reasonable, it is not right, it is not just to Congress or to the people involved, that we should name a second commission to investigate, which will be indirectly named by the Secretary of the Navy. All I ask is that the investigation shall be conducted by a joint committee of the House and Senate, in order to satisfy the House and Senate and to satisfy the country as to the responsibility for the affair. That is all my resolution proposes.

The Coast Guard ship Paulding is interested in this matter. The dereliction was due either to that ship under the Coast Guard or to the S–4 under the Navy. In determining the responsibility between the Coast Guard Service and the Navy service, does anyone think the Secretary of the Navy ought indirectly to name the commission to distribute justice between the two services? In the final judgment as to who is responsible, the Paulding or the S–4, the Coast Guard Service is entitled to a committee selected by and composed of people not interested in one side or the other.

The Coast Guard or the naval service is responsible, and here is a proposition practically to let the Secretary of the Navy indirectly appoint a commission to determine the responsibility between the two services. I say it is not right, it is not just, it is not fair, and the Senate ought not to permit any such commission composed in that way to pass on the matter.

It is said that a circuit judge knows more about this proceeding than do the Members of the House and than do the Members of the Senate. It is apparently believed that a Federal judge in two months can equip himself with more knowledge and information regarding the matter than can Senators who have studied the proposition for 20 years. I say it is not a reasonable proposition to submit. I wish the Secretary of the Navy would telephone the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who seems to father the proposition and not the Secretary, and tell him that he invites the fullest investigation by the House and Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I should be delighted to have the fullest investigation, with the help we can get from this commission first.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, yes; by a commission named by the Secretary of the Navy. Does the Senator from Maine think it is right for the department which is involved to write around the country and try to get people to sit on that commission to determine a case in which they are involved? I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the duties of United States circuit judges and district judges are defined by law. I do not know of any other instance in which it has been proposed to require the judge of a United States circuit court to perform duties of the nature involved in this investigating resolution.

I would like to be informed why the Senator from Maine proposes to modify his resolution by an amendment offered by himself. The original joint resolution contemplates that two members of the committee shall be retired officers of the Navy. His amendment as submitted contemplates that one member of the committee shall be a retired officer of the Navy. His amendment also proposes that one of the other members of the committee shall be a United States circuit or district judge. Manifestly the duties of the committee are not judicial. I doubt the wisdom of imposing on judicial officers the duty of making investigations of this character, namely, nonjudicial investigations. I think it is a bad precedent. I would like to be informed what prompted the Senator from Maine to change his attitude on the subject and to insist now that the resolution be modified so that only one retired officer of the Navy shall be a member of the committee, instead of two, as contemplated by the original resolution, and that one other member of the committee shall be a United States judicial officer.

It is perfectly apparent, Mr. President—at least it is to me—that the duties of the committee are not judicial. It is perfectly clear that it is an effort to impose duties on United States judges which are not contemplated by the statutes creating the offices which those judges fill and defining the duties which they are to perform. I have great confidence in the judiciary of the United States. At the same time I think it is a questionable, not to say a bad, precedent to require a judge, by a joint resolution of the Congress, to perform the duties of an investigator in a case like this.

Supplementing some of the remarks made by the Senator from Virginia, if the investigation is to be of value it should be conducted, in so far as is possible, by those who are not under the domination of the department, whose activities are the subject of inquiry. It is never a sound policy to make a man or a representative of a department under investigation the judge of his or its own acts or conduct.

I would like to have the Senator from Maine tell the Senate why it is proposed now to change the resolution in the manner his amendment provides, if the Senator from Virginia will permit.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield, I shall be glad to explain.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. It was brought to my attention, after the committee had reported, that there was some question in the minds of some Senators whether the commission, as provided for in the resolution, could handle the investigation of the S-4 and act properly in the matter of interrogating the witnesses.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was the Senator in sympathy with that suggestion?

Mr. HALE. I listened to the suggestion and I thought there might be something in it. The idea of providing for a judge was simply to have some one there whom no one could question, whose qualifications no one could question. In so far as dropping a naval officer is concerned, I could see no objection to that. The board was never made up as a naval board in that way.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is the proposed scientific committee organized to give a deliverance in which the whole country will acquiesce; the chief figure, a circuit judge, shall give it six weeks' study and make the deliverance which the whole country will accept.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And a Member of Congress is considered unfit for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Maine himself holds that the view of a circuit judge is better.

Mr. HALE. The judge is put there for a special purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. What is he there for?

Mr. HALE. To question the witnesses.

Mr. SWANSON. A question mark, to ask as to things about which he knows nothing?

Mr. HALE. There is a precedent for this.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, there is no such case in the history of the country.

Mr. HALE. On the Morrow Board Judge Dennison, of Michigan, acted, and he proved of great value to the board in making its investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. The Morrow Board was not a board to investigate any dereliction involved in any accident and to place responsibility. It was a board to devise schemes and methods for aircraft. The President appointed it without any authority of the Congress. He could appoint a commission in this case without any authority of Congress. The President named upon the Morrow Board one Senator and two Members of Congress, and they helped to make the report. It was a splendid report. But why did he do that? It was not appointed to investigate an accident, but to recommend and advise as to the future of aircraft.

The Senator from Maine now brings in a resolution, and says he is the father of it and makes his suggestions with reference to it, by which it is made impossible to appoint a Senator and impossible to appoint a Member of the House and impossible to appoint indeed any one but a civilian. In other words, it is said by the Senator that the Senate and the House ought to refrain from serving on this committee when the Morrow Board, about which he boasts so much, was comprised of one Senator and two Congressman, among others.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will recall that when we met in committee it was suggested to the committee that if they thought it advisable, we could put on the commission a Senator and a Congressman.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not think it was advisable. I am not the father of this resolution. I think it is a wrong procedure. I think it is nothing but an effort of the department to take away from the Congress all of its investigating power. I shall expect to see it followed, if it is adopted, by a resolution to let the President, through the Secretary of State, appoint an ambassador and some international lawyer and an officer from the Army and another from the Navy to investigate the transactions in Nicaragua and to report to Congress. That will be followed by the appointment of somebody to investigate everything to be named by the President on the suggestion of the particular Cabinet member involved.

I have no antagonism toward the Secretary of the Navy, who is courteous and polite. I have a kind regard for him and think he has frequently been unjustly criticized. But I am not going to stand by and see the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I am a member, and of which the Senator from Maine is the chairman and who knows a great deal about the Navy and submarines, abdicate its powers and refuse to exercise its functions as a committee and allow a circuit judge to take our place because he may be a little more apt in asking questions than is the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Virginia has raised an important issue, and I think it is important that we get a clear statement of the situation. I am not in favor of yielding any of the powers of the Senate or of the Congress to investigate the Navy. I will ask the Senator if the law does not now authorize the President to make similar investigations to that which is proposed here?

Mr. SWANSON. The President can do it. He exercised the power in naming the Morrow Aircraft Committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. He wants to make such an investigation in this situation. Not being satisfied with the pending measure—and I think the Senator has reasons for not being satisfied—why does not the Senator offer his proposition as an amendment to the pending joint resolution and let us proceed with our independent investigation and thus in no way interfere with the President?

Mr. SWANSON. I am glad the Senator agrees with what I have done. I have moved to strike out section 3 of the pending joint resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. Why is it necessary to strike out section 3? Why not let the President have his commission, with its own powers, and then provide for a congressional committee to investigate, too?

Mr. SWANSON. This joint resolution was brought in here by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it is said that there is no use for the Senate to proceed to do anything until after the 15th of March, when the report comes in which is provided for in that resolution. I offered an amendment in the committee to let us proceed at once to investigate the matter and was defeated by a vote of 9 to 8. If the Senator from Maine will consent now to let the Vice President name a committee of five and proceed with the investigation, I shall be glad. Will he do that?

Mr. HALE. I certainly will not. I think this resolution is all right.

Mr. SWANSON. Of course, the Senator was opposed to the Senate investigating even before the House submitted the proposition to us that we surrender our right, as they have done, to investigate. We tender a second proposal, namely, that a joint committee be appointed. That proposal does not interfere with any other investigation, but is confined to the liability for the disaster to the S–4. If my amendment shall be adopted and a joint committee shall be named, that committee may investigate the S–4 disaster, and the commission appointed may also investigate to find out how to prevent such accidents and to remove the causes of them. The proposal does not prevent them from looking into the question, and its adoption would not make us wait until the wreck is taken away.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, I am with the Senator so far as the appointment of a congressional committee is concerned, but I do not quite understand the necessity of striking out section 3.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why should Congress create two committees to investigate the S–4 disaster?

Mr. BROOKHART. Because the executive department has seen fit—and it is a coordinate department with Congress—to ask for an investigation on its part.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, the President of the United States already has plenary power to make any investigation of this subject that he chooses.

Mr. SWANSON. If we strike out section 3——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment. The manifest object of this resolution is to prevent the adoption of a resolution providing for an investigation by a joint committee composed of Members of the House of Representatives and Members of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can not agree to that statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I want to emphasize in this connection that the Executive as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States already is endowed with just as much power as can be conferred upon him by any resolution Congress may pass, and that there can be no other motive underlying the insistence upon the pending joint resolution than the thought that it would be absurd for the Congress to appoint two investigating committees.

When this committee is appointed, if it shall be appointed, it ought to be permitted to make a complete investigation; but if the Senate has in mind a reservation that there ought to be an investigation by a committee of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, then we ought to compose this committee in such a way that the investigation can be made by Members of Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean——

Mr. SWANSON. Just a moment.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Arkansas does not mean, does he, that the President can go ahead, appoint a commission, and spend money for the expenses of the commission without congressional authority?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the President can not incur debts or obligations without authorization by Congress.

Mr. HALE. So, then, it is necessary for him to request that authority?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A simple resolution authorizing the President to cause to be investigated this disaster and authorizing an appropriation adequate in amount would accomplish all the purposes the Senator has in mind.

The real issue here is who shall make the investigation? Shall it be made by the members of the respective committees in charge of the responsibility of preparing and reporting legislation to Congress, or shall it be made by a committee composed in part of members selected by the department whose activities are to be investigated?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am going to conclude in a moment, but I want the Senator from Iowa to understand what my proposition is. My proposition is that the investigation of the S–4 disaster, the facts in relation to it, and the responsibility for it should be investigated by a committee of three Senators and three Members of the House, appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and not to give the authority to the President, because he already has authority to investigate. We can give him the money, and then if he wants to have an investigation he can order it as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He has that authority. What I protest against is for us to confer this power upon him and withhold it from ourselves. I am unwilling to be a party to a scheme in which a department can name its own investigators. The Senator from Maine has said that the Secretary of the Navy had already written and asked certain gentlemen to serve on the investigating committee before he introduced a resolution on this subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Who were the gentlemen asked?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Maine named them earlier in the day.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have said that the Secretary of the Navy wrote to certain gentlemen and asked them if they should be appointed whether they would be willing to serve on a commission as a patriotic duty for which they would receive no salary of any kind.

Mr. SWANSON. If I were to be tried by a jury and could name the jurymen, I would write and ask them, "Are you willing to make the sacrifice of sitting on the jury and see that I get justice"? That is the old scheme of packing juries.

Mr. HALE. The President may or may not select the gentlemen whose names have been suggested, though in all probability he will.

Mr. SWANSON. But why did the Secretary of the Navy become so active before the President asked him to do anything?

Mr. HALE. It was at the time when he was considering the advisability of having a commission appointed.

Mr. SWANSON. That is right. He knew the object of it was to prevent a senatorial or congressional investigation.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no. I have already explained to the Senator that that had nothing to do with the object of it. I have already explained they were to be appointed for an entirely different purpose. The Senator remembers——

Mr. SWANSON. I do not want them to take this question up. Proceed as it was originally intended and I will not complain.

Mr. HALE. The Senator remembers the purpose for which they were written to.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; and I think it is a palpable scheme to let somebody named by the Secretary of the Navy apply a coat of whitewash, if that should be necessary, in this transaction if we do not confine the resolution to its original form and not extend it as now sought to include the S–4 disaster.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I should think it would be very bad policy for the Congress to authorize an investigation of this particular subject by two different committees, for the simple reason that in all probability the findings of the two committees would be different. Imagine what would be the situation of the country if the President were authorized by Congress to appoint an investigating commission and the Congress proceeded to appoint another investigating commission, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], and the two commissions found the facts to be different and made different recommendations. The absurdity, to my mind, of such a suggestion appears on the face of it.

Mr. President, this disaster has created serious thought throughout the country. I have great respect for the Navy of the United States, great admiration for its personnel and for its record, but I do feel that it is of the utmost importance that whenever this subject shall be investigated the result of the inquiry shall have commanding force and effect not only with the departments themselves, with the Executive and the Congress, but with the people of this country who are profoundly interested in the subject matter of the investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if there is any question involved in this disaster that is not involved in any jury trial of an accident case or in any coroner's jury sitting in the case of a disaster?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know of no such question.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. With pleasure, though I had concluded, and I yield the floor.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, am I recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, we have had, in the sinking of the submarine S–4, an appalling disaster, which has shocked the people of this country. What the people are interested in and what they are entitled to know is whether the Navy Department could have prevented the disaster in any way; whether the department has been negligent; whether any naval officer has been negligent; and whether we can do anything in the future to prevent the recurrence of a similar disaster. The people want that information and they are entitled to have it.

I for one believe that no greater service can be rendered to the Navy Department than by a thorough investigation of the S–4 disaster and a finding that will be accepted by the people of the country as being fair and impartial and as having gone into every detail of that lamentable occurrence. I believe that the people will not be satisfied with an investigation such as is proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]; and I am more than ever convinced of that fact since listening to the debate this morning. If we follow the course the joint resolution has traveled we can not help but realize that every effort is being made to prevent a congressional investigation. Apparently there is a desire to put every obstacle in the way of such an investigation, to delay it in every possible manner; for what reason I know not.

I started out, having my belief in the efficiency of the Navy, that the S–4 disaster was very likely one of those tragedies which are unavoidable; I hope that may prove to be the case; but when the head of the department is apparently attempting to name his own investigating committee and to conduct his own investigation, I can not help but feel that such an investigation will not be received with the same confidence by the public as would an investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

The Naval Affairs Committees of the House and the Senate are thoroughly familiar with the Navy; they are committees that make the recommendations for legislation for the Navy. They have studied the subject for years.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GERRY. I shall yield in one moment. I wish merely to finish the trend of thought I am pursuing. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Although members of the committee have been intimately acquainted with naval affairs and naval legislation for years, and properly have charge of such legislation, there seems to be an intent here to prevent the legislative branch of the Government conducting an investigation.

Now, let us take for a minute the history of the resolution. The joint resolution, as first introduced, provided that the report of the commission should be filed as soon as possible, but not later than May 15. In other words, this commission would have conducted an investigation and not reported to the President until May 15.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GERRY. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The original joint resolution provided that no report should be made until next December. It was the House that modified it, making it May 15; but originally it was intended that this session of Congress should meet and adjourn without any report on this disaster.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President; I do not think that is so. It simply was not specified. I never heard that question brought up.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is already in the resolution that in part they are not to report until next December.

Mr. HALE. Did it not say "not later than" that time?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I am discussing the joint resolution that was presented to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That joint resolution said "May 15." The matter was discussed in the committee, and there was opposition to the joint resolution. Many Senators felt that there should be a full investigation, and they quite frankly resented the inference that the Senate or the House was not qualified to conduct these investigations. The chairman, at a subsequent meeting of the committee—and he will correct me if I am in error—amended the joint resolution so that it was to be March 15.

Mr. HALE. It was not at my suggestion; it was at the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. GERRY. Well, then, at the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska it was amended to read "March 15."

The original joint resolution did not call upon the President to transmit the findings of the commission, if my recollection is correct, and left the discretion with him. Subsequently, as a result of the protests that arose by Members of this body, it was made to provide that the President shall transmit the report, and that it shall be sent to Congress not later than March 15.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think I understand the Senator. The joint resolution which came over from the House said that he should "transmit the same."

Mr. GERRY. It did not state when.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean that the word "immediately" was not in the joint resolution?

Mr. GERRY. The word "immediately" was not in it. You have amended the joint resolution so as to provide that it shall be done immediately.

The entire committee was in favor of appointing a commission to make further investigations, or any investigations the President saw fit, in regard to the appliances and other devices for rendering submarines safer. There is no objection to that, and I feel that there is no objection in either body; or rather, I feel that either body would not only be glad but would insist on voting every necessary appropriation to develop further devices that would make submarines safer and less probable these appalling disasters. What a great many members of the committee objected to, however, was section 3 of the joint resolution, which gave to a commission power to investigate the S–4 disaster; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has introduced an amendment to strike out this section and insert in place of it a provision that the Vice President and the Speaker of the House shall appoint a committee to investigate the S–4 disaster.

Mr. President, that it is the apparent intent of the department to take from Congress this investigation is to my mind very clear. Instead of having a direct congressional investigation it is developed that the Secretary of the Navy suggested to the President this method of procedure, that he conferred with the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, and the chairman has shown that he will suggest to the President, and the President will appoint five men of his choosing, including a district judge and a naval officer, and that this commission shall do work that to my mind should be done by the Congress. It is simply another example of the tendency of heads of the departments and of the executive branch of this Government to take over all power, and to prevent as much as possible the investigation of their departments by the Congress.

I do not feel that a commission such as this, whether we have a circuit judge on it or not, can be half as conversant with the Navy and the Navy situation as a committee composed of Members of Congress who have been studying and working for the Navy for years; and, frankly, I think the Congress has the right to resent the implied slight that anybody but a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives should be on the commission. Apparently, the one desire is to prevent congressional investigation, or, at least, to delay it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GERRY. One minute, and I am through; I will yield the floor.

As I said in the opening of my remarks, I started out with the hope—and I still have that hope—that the department had done everything possible, that there was no negligence, and that this disaster was unavoidable; but I want that proved to the satisfaction of the House and Senate, and not only to the satisfaction of the House and Senate but to the satisfaction of the American people. I believe that can be proved in no better way than by welcoming a full investigation by their representatives in Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, does the Senator think he has to bother about the feeeling of the House in this matter? Surely the House expressed itself when it passed this joint resolution unanimously.

Mr. GERRY. Oh, I have heard the Senator from Maine reiterate that all morning. What did the House do?

Mr. HALE. They had three hours of debate, Mr. President, and after the three hours of debate there was not one man who voiced a protest against the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GERRY. Three hours of debate! I have been in the House. The Senator has not.

Mr. HALE. I was in the House when the joint resolution passed, just before it passed.

Mr. GERRY. I do not doubt that the Senator had a lot to do with its passage in the House. I am sure he did. I am sure he worked hard, and I am sure all the administration worked hard, and I am sure they did splendid work in the three hours. I congratulate him on what he has accomplished, if he is satisfied.

Mr. HALE. I do not think there was any need to do any work in the House. I think the House saw the merits of the joint resolution.

Mr. GERRY. I may say to the Senator that apparently it is a case of the splendid working of a machine.

Mr. McKELLAR. A whitewash machine.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I still feel that the question is not cleared up as to the issue here.

The Senator from Rhode Island conceded that there is no exclusive right of investigation in the Congress. The Senator from Virginia said the President had the right to investigate this matter. The Senator from Arkansas said the President has that power now. Really, as I understand the joint resolution, about the only power granted the President that he does not have under the law is the appropriation of money to pay the expenses. I do not know of anything else that is added.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me I have seen in the papers that the Navy Department is making an investigation now. Why should we formally give the department the right to make another investigation of the matter? It is making one now, as I understand.

Mr. GERRY. If the Senator will yield to me, there is already a court of inquiry.

Mr. BROOKHART. Wait; let me answer that question. I want one at a time, and I can not answer more than one at a time.

The Navy Department may be making a useless, senseless investigation. It may be that the one the President wants to make is of the same character; but those are questions for the department and for the President to decide. Either the Senate or the House has a right to investigate the matter if it is not satisfied with the other investigation. I will say that after the statements of the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Arkansas I stand ready to vote for any resolution to investigate this matter, either by joint committee of the two Houses or by a Senate committee alone; but, to my mind, that would not——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator no doubt heard the remarks which I submitted during the course of the address of the Senator from Virginia. Does the Senator think that the Congress ought to authorize two investigations and two expenditures for that purpose touching this disaster?

Mr. BROOKHART. First let me ask the Senator, does not the President have the power now to make this investigation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Absolutely; and if the President says to the Congress that, in the performance of his duty as Chief Executive, or as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he is in need of funds to obtain the information that he desires, that the expense can not be met out of his contingent fund, I would vote him any reasonable amount that might be necessary; and I want to point out again to the Senator from Iowa that it would be a very questionable thing for the Congress to create two investigating committees and to take the risk of different conclusions on the part of those two committees.

Whatever conclusion is arrived at ought to be authoritative, it ought to be commanding, and it ought to be made under such conditions that, if legislation is necessary, the recommendations of the committee or commission can be effectuated. It would be to my mind worse than no investigation at all if the President created a commission and they reached a conclusion that the disaster was due to one state of facts and that that state of facts was unavoidable, and another commission reached the conclusion that the disaster was due to a different state of facts, which were avoidable. The confidence of the country in the Congress would be shaken, if not destroyed.

There is no necessity for more than one investigation, provided it is a fair, complete investigation. Why should Congress hasten to authorize the expenditure of funds for two investigations and take the chance of different conclusions which would destroy the confidence of the country in the integrity of the investigation, and prevent such legislation as might be actually necessary to prevent the recurrence of such disasters?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I will answer that proposition by a statement, then I will yield to anybody; but one at a time. I can see only one thing at a time.

I will concede that Congress should not authorize two investigations by Congress. That would be a foolish thing. I concede that the Senate should not authorize two Senate investigations, or that the House should not authorize two House investigations. But the investigation proposed by this resolution is to be by the Chief Executive himself. He did not have to submit to us the question of the appointment of the commission. The money is all that he had to ask for, but he submitted more than he was required to submit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is bound to realize that there are many provisions in this resolution that are not related directly to the mere expenditure of funds by the Executive. The effect of this resolution is to clothe the President with power to create a commission under the authority of the Congress to make this investigation, and in good faith, if the Congress grants that authority, it ought to rely on it, and for my part I intend to do so. If the Congress decides that it ought to create the commission or the committee authorized under this resolution, unless it becomes manifest that the committee has failed to perform its duty, I do not intend to vote for an investigation by another committee, because notwithstanding the fact that the personnel of this committee is not to consist of Members of Congress, it is, nevertheless, in a measure a congressional investigation, because the authority for the investigation is in a resolution to be passed by the Congress, and the duty of the investigators is defined by the Congress. Therefore I say that if we pass this resolution of investigation—and that is the intention of the persons who espouse this resolution—it is to prevent or to avoid the necessity for another investigation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Will the Senator pause there? Let me answer that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not mean to take so much of the Senator's time.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Virginia said, and I think the Senator from Arkansas said, that even though we held a congressional investigation, it was all right for this committee of experts to make their investigation from the expert standpoint, and to let us know the facts as they found them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator pardon me? I said that it was proper for the Executive, who is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, to take any course he desired to take to acquaint himself with the true facts involved in this disaster.

Mr. BROOKHART. He can submit the matter to Congress or not, as he desires.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. However, he can not spend the public money for an investigation without our consent.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. In just a moment. As I see this, we are adding no authority in this resolution and providing for no investigation that the Executive does not have authority to make already. If I am mistaken in that, I shall certainly not consent to surrender any of the power of either the Senate or the House to investigate anything they want to investigate.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Arkansas is favorable to the resolution as amended by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the Senator from Arkansas know that it proposes two investigations?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; I do not understand that.

Mr. HOWELL. It does. It does not do away with this commission to be appointed by the President, but it provides that the disaster shall be investigated by a committee of Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I understand that. I think that is proper.

Mr. HOWELL. There would be two committees or commissions to report, under the provisions of the resolution as amended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Under the amendment of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no. If the Senator will permit me, I take from this general commission the power to investigate the S–4.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; but the Senator provides for two investigations.

Mr. SWANSON. No. The House has presented to us a proposition to let the Secretary of the Navy appoint a commission which shall investigate the appliances needed to improve submarines, and, in addition, to investigate the cause of the S–4 disaster. The position I take is that the commission should not investigate the S–4 disaster. A joint commission of the two Houses ought to investigate that. It is different work, different authorizations, and different things to investigate.

Mr. HOWELL. How can this proposed commission properly report what appliances and methods should have been used and should be used in the future to avoid such casualties unless they know the circumstances under which this disaster took place?

Mr. SWANSON. So far as it pertains to their ascertaining facts which would be a foundation for future improvements, that is all right; but to ascertain and report as to whether the Paulding was in fault or whether the S–4 was in fault is another matter. A scheme is presented to let the Secretary of the Navy alone, through his appointments, determine between the Coast Guard and the Navy.

Mr. HOWELL. Just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely want to make a brief statement. The Senator from Iowa has been very kind, and if it will disturb him in any way I will not insist on speaking.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not quite through. Had the Senator from Nebraska replied to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HOWELL. I want to reply to the Senator from Virginia, if I might.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator from Virginia suggests that there is no connection between these two investigations. There is a distinct connection between them. How can the commission provided for in this resolution properly determine what supplemental submarine appliances and regulations should be adopted by the Navy to avoid and minimize similar casualties in the future unless the proposed commission goes into the facts and circumstances of this disaster?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I said in my speech that, so far as they want to improve the Navy, so far as they want to make recommendations, so far as they want to see what deficiency there was in the material and appliances, they would have a right to do it, but when it came to determining as to whether the Paulding was at fault or whether the S–4 was at fault in this accident, I thought that all honesty required that they should have an impartial committee, and I provided for that.

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President, incidentally they would have to investigate the facts and circumstances in order to determine whether even additional naval regulations were necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, incidentally they would, and I am giving them the instrumentality that you want. This resolution gives them absolute control of it, not as an incident.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Senate will have power to investigate notwithstanding the adoption of this resolution, if it sees fit to do so. Congress will have power to investigate irrespective of whether this resolution passes or not. I am for investigations upon all occasions, because I believe they are a tremendous safeguard in the conduct of government. If the President and the Secretary of the Navy want an investigation, I say let them have it. Then let us investigate, if we are ultimately dissatisfied in the premises. There will be plenty of time after the 15th of March, before Congress adjourns—about three months.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have to go to a committee meeting, and I want to ask a question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well. The Senator from Utah has been asking for recognition for a long time, and I promised to yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator that the President has every power now included in this resolution. He can have any investigation he wants. I would be willing to vote for the resolution to authorize an appropriation of the $20,000 he asks for, or amend it to give him $100,000, if he asks for it. The only thing I do not want is to have this considered as a congressional committee instead of an executive commission. I do not want to be responsible for the kind of commission it is or for the acts of the commission. I do not want it said, when we start an investigation on our own hook, "By congressional act you have already authorized an investigation."

Having absolute confidence in the President of the United States, I do not favor telling him what kind of an investigating committee he shall have. I think this resolution is an insult to the President of the United States. With the full power to appoint any kind of an investigating committee he wants, with every power we give under this resolution, all that we do is to say, "We do not trust you to appoint your commission."

What I want to do is to strike out everything except the authorization of an appropriation for whatever amount he wants—he has asked for $20,000—to make any kind of an investigation by any committee that he may select, or in any manner that he may choose, and leave it in that shape, because the rest of it is an insult to the President of the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think I am in full accord with the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What I want to make clear is that under the procedure we seem about to take here we contemplate creating, under authority of Congress, two commissions to make this investigation. The President has power to make the investigation; and, as I said before, I am perfectly willing to give him any amount of money he finds necessary to perform the duty of ascertaining the facts in connection with the disaster.

If we are to create a commission under authority of Congress and tell the President who shall go on that commission and how the commission shall discharge its duties, as this resolution seems to do, then I shall certainly oppose creating another committee of investigation under the authority of Congress for the reason that I have already stated, that there is a danger that the two committees may make conflicting findings and recommendations, in which event the country will be worse off and the Navy will be no better off than before the investigations proceeded.

The President, as Commander in Chief, has a duty to perform. He is entitled to obtain this information. But he is not entitled to do it under the guise of a congressional committee. If he wants to proceed in that way, the Congress should constitute the committee in the way that it believes best.

I think Senators are overlooking the fact that we are about to create two committees of investigation, and that those committees may take an entirely different view of what are the facts and what are the remedies to prevent a recurrence of such disasters as that relating to the S–4, and it is that feature that I want to safeguard. If we pass the joint resolution in the form in which it is presented by the Senator from Maine. I shall still favor the creation of an additional joint committee of Congress or a committee of the Senate to make the same investigation, and I will think that it is the underlying purpose of those who propose the resolution to estop the Congress in a way from making any investigation of the subject by expressly conferring on an executive tribunal the duty of making the investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offered in the committee——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me answer the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas first. The only part to be stricken out of the joint resolution is section 3, as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Frankly, I think if the amendment of the Senator from Virginia shall be agreed to, the other features of the joint resolution should be so modified, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], as to give the President unlimited authority and adequate funds. We ought not to impose on the President the duty of selecting a committee from a limited number of individuals, and we ought to give him an entirely free hand to make his own investigation in any way that he desires. If we want a congressional investigation of the subject, we ought to provide for a personnel that will reflect itself in legislation here, and it ought to be composed of Members of the two Houses.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am absolutely in accord with what the Senator has said. I am entirely in accord with every word the Senator from Nevada has said. That is what I have been trying to say.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, would the Senator from Arkansas favor the joint resolution if it were limited merely to the appropriation of the necessary funds for the President?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have said during the debate that I believe the duty is on the Executive, as Commander in Chief of the Navy, to inquire into the facts of the matter, and that I am perfectly willing to give him such funds as he finds necessary to enable him to make his investigation.

Mr. BROOKHART. It seems to me we have reached substantial agreement in the matter, and I can see no reason why the resolution should not be re-formed so as to give the President the full right to make the investigation he pleases and to have the personnel he pleases and to report to whom he pleases. We can provide the money, as we ought to do, for such an investigation. It will be the Executive's investigation and he alone will be responsible for it. We can then order another investigation and have one of our own for which we will be responsible, either as a committee of the Congress composed of Members of the two Houses jointly, or of the Senate alone. I feel that in the Daugherty investigation I contributed something to determine the power of the Senate to make investigations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am in accord with what the Senator from Nevada said and what was said by the Senator from Arkansas, and I endeavored to get the floor several moments ago to make that statement. I am opposed to anything in the resolution other than the creation of the committee named in the resolution or amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia. I do not think we should mention the President at all. I differ from my friend in that respect.

I have no doubt that the Commander in Chief has full authority to make such investigation as he sees fit, and when he makes such investigation, or if he desires in advance to get money with which to make it, let him send a message to the Congress stating that he contemplates making such investigation and asking for such appropriation as he desires. For instance, quite recently he conceived the importance of sending a commission to the Geneva conference, and later, when the funds were exhausted, he sent a message to the Congress asking for an appropriation to pay the commission. His first message asked for funds to pay the commission, submitted before it was created, and his second message, after the funds were exhausted, asked for funds for a continuation of the commission in subsequent negotiations at Geneva.

The President has full authority. If he desires to conduct an investigation, let him do so, appointing whom he pleases, when he pleases. I think that it is an infringement upon the power of the President to limit the personnel of those whom he wishes to appoint. After he has concluded to have an investigation, let him send his message to the Congress if he has not the funds, and Congress will give whatever is necessary. But instead of the procedure proposed in the present resolution let us appoint a commission, determine their limitations and their duties, and provide the necessary appropriation for their activities. That is all we need to do.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator from Utah is correct except in one particular. At the very beginning of the discussion the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] announced that the President desired the investigation, so that in that official way at least, though not by any formal message, the President has expressed his desire for such an investigation.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. To show the Senator what the proposition is, I want to state what occurred in the Committee on Naval Affairs. I was willing for the President to have the money, as the Senator suggests. There is no objection to that. I offered a resolution in the Committee on Naval Affairs providing that that committee, through its chairman, should appoint a subcommittee to investigate the facts in connection with the sinking of the S–4, and it was voted down. I have always contended and I still say that if I can be given the assurance that either the Senate itself, through a special committee, or the Committee on Naval Affairs will investigate the sinking of the S–4, I am willing to give the President all the money he may need for his own investigation; but I am not willing to give the President money under an implied understanding that the Congress has surrendered its right and authority, as will surely be urged by some Senators, to investigate the sinking of the S–4. All of these propositions now contended for by those on the other side of the aisle will be used for the purpose of proving that surrender. If Senators favor my suggestion, let us have the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs accept my proposition as made before the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the President should be given the necessary money to proceed with such investigation as he wants to make in connection with the needs for reform and the needs for new appliances, and then let the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate proceed to ascertain who is responsible as between the Paulding, operated by the Coast Guard Service, and the S–4, operated by the Navy.

There is no reason in the world why we should let the Secretary of the Navy make the recommendation to the President and the President appoint a commission and not allow the Coast Guard to have any representation on that commission, when the issue is between the Coast Guard and the Navy as to which is responsible. In other words, it is proposed to let the Navy constitute the jury to determine the matter. I am not in favor of that. I am not in favor of it if the proposition should come from the Democratic side. I am not in favor of it if the proposition should come from the Republican side. I shall ask for a roll call on the proposition and give an opportunity to those Senators who want to go on record as favoring the Navy Department, through the President, naming its own jury to try the case, to then express themselves.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia evidently was not present when the Senator from Nevada submitted his proposition.

Mr. SWANSON. I heard the statement of the Senator from Nevada, and I am not willing for such a proposition to go through.

Mr. BROOKHART. His suggestion was not that we surrender anything to the Executive——

Mr. SWANSON. I am not going to make a surrender in this matter and then let it be claimed later that because we have given the President the authority to do it, therefore we ought not to make the investigation until he has completed his investigation. That is the scheme. I insist that we allow the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee to appoint a subcommittee to investigate and report on the sinking of the S–4, and then I shall consent that the President shall have all the money he wants for his own investigation.

Mr. HALE. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] made his suggestion. As I understand, he proposes to strike out all the wording of the joint resolution, and to provide:

> That the sum of $20,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of a commission to be appointed by him to investigate and report——

Mr. McKELLAR. No, no!

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator may be for that, but I am not for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I will state exactly what I think the Senator from Nevada suggested:

That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the President for the purpose of making such investigation of the sinking of the submarine S–4 as he may see fit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And to follow that with the incorporation of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia providing for an investigation by a joint committee composed of members of the Committees on Naval Affairs of the House and Senate.

Mr. HALE. That is authorizing the Senate to do it and authorizing the President to do the same thing, is it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; it is giving the President, as Commander in Chief of the Navy, the funds he desires to enable him to acquaint himself with the true facts in the case, and it is also providing for an investigation as contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. That is a correct statement, as I understand it, of the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada, and that is my suggestion.

Mr. HALE. What would the President do? I do not understand the plan. What would the President's commission do?

Mr. McKELLAR. It would make any kind of an investigation the President would want to have made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The President can employ any agency whatever, as he can do now. He can take any course he chooses to pursue. The only reason why the appropriation is made is that it has been stated here that he has not the funds with which to ascertain the facts.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me answer the Senator from Arkansas again. I think it would be contrary to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada to couple such a proposition with the resolution just suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Nevada suggested, and with that suggestion I am in full accord, that our investigation should be ours, independent absolutely of the Executive's investigation, and his independent in relation to ours. Therefore, in the resolution it seems to me that we should only provide for those funds in a general way. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I stand ready to vote for his proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is not the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada as I understand it, and it was not my suggestion. I must be deficient in my power of expression or I would not have to take the floor so many times to explain what I have been trying to say for an hour.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; just a moment, please. The President has the right as Commander in Chief to make an inquiry into this subject. That is an Executive investigation. If he needs funds to accomplish that purpose I am willing to give them to him in this or any other resolution. But I do think that there should be an investigation by a congressional joint committee, as provided by the Senator from Virginia in his proposed amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me ask the Senator a question. I am in full accord with all that he has stated; but does the Senator insist that the congressional investigation should be made as a condition or trade in any way?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; certainly not; but I do think that while we are dealing with the subject we should dispose of the whole matter and provide for the congressional investigation.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am quite in agreement with that idea, and if an amendment should be offered providing for a congressional investigation in addition to what we authorize the President to do, I am ready to vote for it.

Mr. SWANSON. That is exactly what we are trying to do. The House has passed a joint resolution to give the President $20,000 to conduct any investigation he wants. They ask for an investigation of the S–4 disaster and provide that the commission should be limited. My proposition is simply to say that the sinking of the S–4 shall be investigated by a joint committee of the House and Senate. Then the measure will have to go back to the House, of course. I want the Senate to express itself on the proposition of whether it wants a joint congressional committee authorized by Congress, or merely wants to let the Secretary of the Navy name the jury to try his own case. That is the issue so far as I am concerned.

Let the President appoint whomsoever he pleases. I am going to offer an amendment, and let it go to the House, for the appointment of a joint committee to investigate this subject.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would not interfere with the presidential investigation; I would support it.

Mr. SWANSON. Arrange it so that the President's commission may proceed. My proposition does not interfere with that. It is stated that the crux of the joint resolution is section 3.

Mr. HALE. What has the President to do with this investigation?

Mr. SWANSON. I thought the President wanted to investigate everything in reference to the submarines, and that there were 2,000 devices which could be studied.

The Senator said in his speech that he had found that that was what they were going to investigate, and the Senator suggested that we should also turn over to them the right to investigate the disaster in connection with the submarine S–4.

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Maine was the man who recommended that Congress should surrender its authority and its right of investigation, and that it be done by the department.

Mr. HALE. I do not consider that Congress is surrendering its authority.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, our contention is very simple. We want Congress to investigate the S–4 disaster; for unless Congress shall investigate the results will not command the same confidence, nor will there be the kind of investigation which we think should be conducted. That is why the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] proposes to strike out section 3 of the joint resolution. Section 3 simply refers to the S–4 disaster. Besides that, as has been brought out here, there was a desire to appoint a commission, as the chairman of the committee said, to investigate safety appliances and inventions that might prevent future disasters. We were quite willing to give the President an appropriation to go ahead and investigate as to such inventions, but when it comes down to the question of the S–4, we think Congress is the proper body to investigate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. I have never known the people of my section of the country to be so stirred as they have been by this disaster. There is a feeling—and I believe it is universal—that somebody is to blame. The Senate can not afford to evade its responsibility. There must be an investigation conducted by the Senate and the House of Representatives in order that the country may be satisfied that there is no such thing as a whitewashing of the situation. So I am in hearty accord with this proposal.

If the President has no funds with which to carry on his investigation, let us give him funds, but of more importance is to have Congress itself seek to place the responsibility where it belongs. We can not afford to evade or escape the responsibility which rests upon us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am opposed to the joint resolution in the form in which is has been reported by the committee. First, it circumscribes the powers which belong to the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. It seeks to indicate to him the character of the machinery which shall be set up for the investigation. It states who the investigators shall be, one of whom shall be a judge—and that is very offensive to me—as was pointed out by the able minority leader.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we need not concern ourselves in this resolution with any of the powers or functions or responsibilities of the Executive. Doubtless the President will make an investigation. He may select a judge; I do not know. He may select civilian experts; I do not know. That is for him to determine. When the President of the United States needs funds, if he does not already possess them, let him appeal to Congress and Congress will readily and speedily grant whatever the President requires in order to conduct a full and complete investigation; but it seems to me that the resolution which we should adopt—and it should be entirely disconnected, as I have indicated, from the duties of the President—should merely determine the manner of selecting the committee.

I am in accord with the view suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] permitting the Vice President to appoint three Members of the Senate, the Speaker of the House to appoint three Members of the House of Representatives; that those six shall constitute a joint commission or committee for the purpose of making an investigation of this disaster; and provide for them the necessary funds. When that shall be done, that is as far as the resolution should go. I am opposed to mentioning the President; I am opposed to determining whom he shall appoint or how he shall appoint them or to prescribing in any way the duties and responsibilities of a commission selected by the President of the United States, if he shall deem it wise to select one.

I would go further, however, Mr. President, than the resolution or the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia goes. I think the proposed commission should proceed to make a comprehensive study of the Navy, its needs and its wants, and particularly of submarines and airplanes.

There have been a number of submarine disasters. Quite recently another submarine was sunk. A great many vessels were wrecked upon the Pacific coast. There have been, however, no adequate investigations made of these numerous disasters occurring during the past three or four years. I am advised that in a single instance only has the Navy Department even reprimanded any of those who are connected with these disasters. It may be that the disasters were entirely unavoidable but the public are not satisfied with the naval investigations which have been made in the case of these numerous disasters, and, therefore, I feel that a committee should be appointed by the House and the Senate, with full authority to investigate this disaster as well as former disasters, and to take into account the needs of the Navy and to make recommendations relative to these disasters and relative to the needs of the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KING. I promised first to yield to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator, would it not be better for this resolution to appoint no commission at all, but merely to authorize the appropriation of $20,000 to enable the President to make any investigation that he may see fit, if he sees fit to make one? Then if the President saw fit to make an investigation, and wanted to use $20,000 for that purpose, all he would have to do would be to indicate that fact to the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses, and the appropriation would be forthcoming. He would have full authority to appoint anybody he pleased, and it would not be necessary to name the commission. Then, if the Congress desired to make an independent investigation, all well and good.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should prefer that that course should not be pursued. I want to dissociate, so far as possible, the executive from the legislative branch of the Government. If the President wants to make an investigation, let him indicate to the Senate or to Congress that he needs funds, and if he does not have adequate funds, Congress would very promptly grant the President whatever funds he desires; but this resolution which we are asked to pass, in my opinion, should deal only with the creation of a joint commission, determining their powers and prescribing their limitations and providing the necessary funds for them to carry on the investigation required. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator that the President has done just what the Senator from Utah thinks he ought to do? If I understood the Senator from Utah correctly, he said that if the President needed funds he ought to come here and say so. Is not that precisely what the President did in his message of January 4?

Mr. KING. If the Senator regards that as an application by the President of the United States for funds, I am willing to vote for a separate resolution right now providing that a certain sum shall be appropriated out of the Treasury for the purpose of enabling the Executive at his request to conduct an investigation into the S–4 disaster. Then go on with our resolution; but do not couple them together. That is the view that I take.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the President's message was very brief, and if I may be permitted to do so, I should like to read the two short paragraphs of the message which he submitted on the 4th of January last:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending that Congress be requested to authorize the appointment of a commission of experts for the purpose of considering the development of safety devices for our submarines, such commission to be empowered to call witnesses and to pay their expenses, and also to make such inquiry and investigation into the S–4 disaster as may be desirable.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the next sentence:

I recommend to Congress the passage of a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of such a commission of experts, and that the sum of $20,000 be made available for the purposes stated.

In other words, the President has already stated his desire to appoint such a commission, and has in fact asked for the money to pay its expenses.

Mr. President, a little earlier in the debate the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] referred to the fact that the aircraft board appointed by the President a little over two years ago had done good work; that it had congressional representation on it, and he referred to me in that connection. I should like to call the attention of Senators to one or two matters in connection with that investigation which they may have forgotten. Evidently the Senator from Virginia has forgotten the exact nature of that circumstance or he would not have referred to it in quite the way he did.

In the first place, there were some very serious accidents which had taken place. It was not merely a commission to recommend new types of aircraft; it was a commission to look into a very serious situation which has arisen. Mr. President, you may remember that the country was aroused at that time very deeply by the disaster to the Shenandoah, when the Navy lost a number of its able airship experts. The country was further aroused by the fact that Commander Rodgers in his attempt to make the flight from San Francisco to Honolulu had been lost for some nine days at sea and had been given up for lost. Nevertheless, finally, due to his skill as a navigator, he turned up on the shores of Kauai. By sundry statements which had been made with regard to accidents that had taken place in the service the country was further aroused to such a point that very great publicity was given to the claims made by a then member of the Army with regard to the bad condition of affairs in the Air Service. So, in response to a similar state of public opinion as we have seen in this instance, the President—Congress not being in session, for this happened, if my recollection serves me correctly, in the early part of September, in the year 1925—the President did exercise his right of appointing a commission, a commission of nine. Later he asked Congress for an appropriation to cover the expenses of the commission. Had the Congress been in session when the accidents occurred undoubtedly the President would have done just as he has done in this case.

The accident to the S–4 took place in December, and my recollection is that it was just before Congress adjourned for the holiday recess. At any rate the Congress was in session. So, instead of attempting to appoint a commission, as the Senator from Virginia suggested, without reference to the Congress, he did the natural thing of reminding Congress that an investigation ought to be had, that a commission ought to be appointed, that he would like to be authorized to appoint it, and requested that an appropriation be authorized for that purpose.

The air board he selected in 1925 had congressional representation, one Senator and two Members of the House, as the Senator from Virginia has stated. I will confess that it seems to me desirable on all commissions of this kind that there should be a representative of each House of Congress, in order the better to follow the progress of the investigation and later be able to report on the floor of each House what the recommendations of the commission were, and to explain them, and more or less to act as the advocate of the commission. I should like to see this commission increased from five to seven, to include one Senator and one Member of the House, or to see it enlarged to eight and include one Senator and two Members of the House, so as to make it possible for such representation to be had. But the Senator from Virginia is not correct in stating that the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that a Federal judge be appointed is establishing a new precedent, for that is precisely what the President did in appointing the aircraft board.

The aircraft board of nine was composed, among others, of one ex-Army officer, General Harbord, who was there to give us liaison with the Army and to represent the Army's point of view in this investigation. And may I further remind the Senator at this point that the investigation was asked for by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in the same spirit in which the Secretary of the Navy has asked for this investigation? They wrote a letter to the President asking him to appoint a committee of investigation. Congress was not in session, and so he appointed it. He put on the board also a retired naval officer, Admiral Fletcher, who had received the congressional medal of honor. He represented the Navy on that committee. Also, as has been stated, the President put on a Senator and two Members of the House to represent the Congress, and it was a very useful thing for us who were on it to be able to know exactly what the commission was doing.

Another member was an aeronautical engineer, corresponding in this case to one of the civilians suggested to be appointed on this commission. Another was a man who had been in charge of the aircraft board during the war, and who was entirely familiar with the great growth of the air services and of what had been done in aircraft manufacturing during the period since the war; the eighth was Mr. Dwight Morrow and the ninth was a Federal judge, who knew nothing about aviation.

The Senator has objected to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine in regard to putting on a Federal judge, because he said the Federal judge would not know anything about submarines. Mr. President, as a member of the President's aircraft board I want to testify to the very great service which was rendered on that board by the two members of it who admittedly knew nothing about the conditions in the Army and Navy and the conditions in the Air Service, namely, Dwight Morrow, who was the chairman of the board, and came to it with an entirely fresh mind, never having devoted himself at all to aviation, and Judge Denison, the Federal judge, who came smilingly saying that this was an entirely new subject to him and that he knew nothing about it. As a matter of fact, the commission depended in very great degree upon the judicial character of the minds of these two gentlemen who knew nothing about the subject, who came to it with fresh minds, absolutely impartial, and who gave to the investigation a judicial atmosphere and helped make it a great success.

I am surprised to hear certain Senators on the other side of the aisle say that there is nothing judicial about this commission, nothing judicial about the investigation. It seems to me almost as though they had it in mind that if there is nothing judicial about it there ought to be something political about it.

In fact, they have told us that the people of the country would not be satisfied with an investigation by experts and by a Federal judge, with one ex-naval officer to see to it that they had such expert advice as they needed. Personally, I think the Senators who have taken that position are mistaken. So far as I am able to follow public opinion in the State of Connecticut, they certainly are mistaken.

For instance, here is a brief editorial from one of the oldest country newspapers in the State of Connecticut, the Norwich Bulletin, a paper about 140 years old, an independent paper that ably represents public opinion throughout the eastern section of the State. Listen to what this old-fashioned newspaper says.

The editorial is headed:

MAKE IT IMPARTIAL

There are Democratic Senators who want a Senate investigation of the sinking of the S–4 instead of the impartial plan proposed by the President. It is impossible to look upon such a move as anything but partisan. The purpose is plainly disclosed in the very attitude that is taken.

Everyone must be desirous of having all the facts brought out in connection with that deplorable affair, and there's no question but what they will be; but there should be an equally broad desire that such a matter should be kept as free from politics as possible. The clamor of Democratic Senators for their own inquiry, their chance to kick up a lot of claims and charges, like a raft of criticism that has been spread about through irresponsible statements and gossip only to have it shown to be without foundation, makes a poor impression.

From the political standpoint nothing would be better. But it isn't the political ends that should be served through such a misfortune. The inquiry already under way by the Navy is throwing valuable light upon the situation that existed and is indicating the conditions that prevailed at the time of the collision and the efforts that were made to raise the submarine.

That inquiry promises to be in every way thorough and there is no question but what the facts will be brought out, but for the purpose of having an inquiry by competent investigators, experts outside of the Navy, which is directly interested, the idea of an impartial board to conduct the same outside of politics and all other influences is what the situation requires. This it is believed the country prefers to a political inquiry regardless of the party sponsoring it.

I submit that that is also the opinion of a large part of the American public. They looked upon the action of the President in appointing an impartial air board consisting of experts, of ex-representatives of the Army and Navy, a Federal judge, and one or two private citizens, to investigate the Air Service, as very successful. They wish to see the same kind of thing done here. They believe that it will be done better by a commission of experts, as suggested in this joint resolution, than by a commission which is sponsored by a minority of the committee by a strict party vote. It looks to the public like playing politics with a very serious matter, and it seems to me that we ought to be careful before we, by our votes, condone the playing of politics in this matter.

The President has shown his desire to appoint an impartial commission. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] over and over again says the Secretary of the Navy is going to appoint the commission. That is begging the question, Mr. President. The joint resolution lays upon the President of the United States the responsibility of appointing the commission, not upon the Secretary of the Navy, although by constant repetition, in accordance with that well-known law of psychology which tells us that if you state a thing often enough people will come to believe it, the Senator from Virginia has almost convinced some Senators that the Secretary of the Navy is going to appoint this commission.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I got my information mostly from the chairman of the committee, who said the Secretary of the Navy had already written and asked people to serve on the commission. I do not know what he meant by it. It seems to me he has been very busy in getting somebody to serve on this commission.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would quote me correctly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Virginia has been very adroit in misquoting the Senator from Maine over and over again, until nearly everybody in this Chamber believes he has been correctly quoted.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask the Senator from Maine what he did say.

Mr. HALE. I said that the Secretary of the Navy, before going ahead with a commission that he wanted appointed to investigate submarine appliances and equipment and to make recommendations for the future, had sounded out three men to see if they would serve on such a commission if appointed by the President.

Mr. SWANSON. That is all I said—that the Secretary of the Navy had been active in getting somebody to serve on the commission, and had gotten the names, and that no doubt the President would recommend whomsoever he had found to serve to suit him. All I said is what the Senator from Maine said. I did not know, until this morning, that he had been so active in getting his own jury.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Virginia has repeated his opinion so often that he actually believes it himself.

Mr. SWANSON. Why, everybody believes it who knows anything about the natural course of things in Washington. Do you suppose that the Secretary of the Navy would write around and get people to serve on a commission to recommend to the President, and that the President would refuse to appoint them? Not much! The Senator is very innocent if he thinks that has ever occurred. His innocence is refreshing, but it is dangerous to anybody who trusts him.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will consider the list that he did write to, I think he will see that there will be no occasion for the President to refuse.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know much about the list.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is obvious.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know the circuit judge, but I know I am willing to have three Senators named by the Vice President—there can not be any politics in it—and three Representatives named by the Speaker of the House to investigate this matter that involves two separate branches of the Government. You must remember that the Coast Guard is interested in this matter. It was a collision between the Paulding and the S–4. Do you not think, in all fairness and justice, that they ought to have an impartial committee, and not one named by the Secretary of the Navy, or named by the President on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator must remember that in the aircraft investigation there were two separate departments concerned, the War Department and the Navy Department. Both asked for the investigation, and trusted the President to see to it that a proper personnel would be picked out; and the country was satisfied with the personnel which was picked out. It has never been called a partial committee just because the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War asked for its appointment.

In order that I may not be accused of quoting one newspaper from one part of my State which might differ from others, I should like to read a very brief editorial from the Hartford Courant, the oldest daily newspaper published in America. This is a very brief editorial, written by an editor who is far from always having supported the President, but whose experience in writing editorials for the last 25 years in western Massachusetts and northern Connecticut has shown him to be keenly in touch with public opinion. I should like to call it to the attention of my good friend the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The editorial is headed:

SENATE BLOCKS "S–4" INVESTIGATION

President Coolidge's recommendation that Congress authorize the appointment of a board of five experts to investigate the S–4 disaster and suggest improvements in submarine safety devices has struck a snag in the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. It is the contention of Democratic committeemen, who like most politicians can discover a disguised motive behind every lamp-post, that the President's plan represents an endeavor to "whitewash" the tragedy and that the investigation should be held by the Naval Affairs Committee or by a special committee of the Senate. This is going pretty far afield to play politics.

A naval court of inquiry is now sitting in Boston, investigating the details of the S–4 tragedy. Its work might be supplemented by an inquiry undertaken by a special committee of the Senate or by the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. But if the naval court may justly or unjustly be charged with prejudice, a senatorial committee might rather more justly than unjustly be charged with partisanship. To insure an unprejudiced, nonpartisan investigation of a disaster that has greatly stirred the country the President has sought the establishment of an obviously unprejudiced, nonpartisan board, composed of two naval and three civilian experts. The House of Representatives has given this plan its indorsement.

The Senate should hasten to do likewise. If Senators insist upon holding their own investigation thereafter, let them go ahead and hold it. But there is no doubting which investigation will have the confidence of the public. The public is fully aware of the fact that the business and professional men who make up the Senate are as incapable of suggesting improvements in submarine construction as they would be of suggesting improvements in Einstein's theory of relativity.

Mr. President, as that editor has said, "This is going pretty far afield to play politics." There is no effort on the part of the Republicans, so far as I can see, to have a Republican Senator put on this commission to "whitewash" the Navy. There is no effort to whitewash anybody in this. This is an effort to find out the facts, to secure a committee that the country will respect as being a committee of the highest grade of experts, with nothing to gain politically or in their careers one way or another by serving without pay on this commission; a committee whose findings will be respected by everybody in the country. The American people will know, when this commission finds either for or against the Navy, either for or against the Coast Guard, that they are finding what they honestly believe to be the facts, and that they are not attempting to play politics in this or any other matter.

It is too often the case that those of us who are in political life are accused, justly or unjustly, of attempting to play politics. Far be it from me to say that a committee such as the Senator from Virginia has suggested would attempt to play politics. Far be it from me to say that any member of that committee would endeavor to get himself on the front pages of the newspapers as the chief investigator, day after day asking stinging questions of witnesses, and securing such publicity as might aid him in securing his reelection to the Senate. Far be it from me to say that there is any politics in it at all. But if the Senator's idea is merely to have the representation of Congress on this committee, as was had on the air board, to which he referred, why, then, does he not limit it to one Senator—and I should be perfectly willing to have that Senator the Senator from Virginia himself—and one Representative, rather than to have the entire committee composed of Senators and Representatives?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if there is any politics in this, it is the politics of trying to prevent a development of the real facts by a disinterested, uncontrolled committee of Congress.

What is the politics in this? If the Navy Department has done nothing wrong—I am not saying whether it has or has not—why should it object to a full investigation? The politics comes in the effort to create a commission such as never has been created before with the consent of Congress, a new departure. The politics is that the Navy Department do not want an impartial investigation by a committee named by the Speaker and Vice President. I say there ought not to be any politics in this investigation, so in my resolution I provide that the two Houses, headed by vigorous Republicans, shall name the committee.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on January 19, 1928, the President approved and signed the act (S. 773) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of the State of Iowa.

CLAIM OF MARION LETCHER (S. DOC. NO. 42)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation for the relief of Mr. Marion Letcher, American consul general at Copenhagen, Denmark. It appears that on February 18, 1927, while Mr. Letcher was the responsible officer in charge, the office of the consulate general at Copenhagen was burglarized and official moneys in a total equivalent to $252.93, for which Mr. Letcher is accountable, were stolen. Notwithstanding the efforts of Mr. Letcher, aided by the local police, no recovery has been made.

The conclusion reached by the Secretary of State has my approval and I recommend that the Congress authorize an appropriation of $252.93 to be paid to Mr. Letcher.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 20, 1928.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ALLEGED MEXICAN PROPAGANDA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I had intended having something to say this morning about the misrepresentations regarding myself relative to the controversy which took place on the floor of the Senate the other day after I had made a speech upon the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican scandal. The Washington Post of this morning contains a telegram from the mayor of Montgomery, Ala., to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in which he criticizes me. I have sent two telegrams to Montgomery to get some information regarding that mayor. I do not now wish to interfere with the progress of the pending joint resolution; I myself am anxious that it should be passed; but on Monday, after the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] shall have finished his speech, I shall address the Senate in reference to this matter and in reference to the mayor of Montgomery and two or three whisky newspapers in Alabama that have fought me always politically and which have attacked me since this incident occurred here the other day.

I shall also have some things to say about some other newspapers. I intend that the truth about this whole subject shall go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that every man and woman in the country who is really an American, who appreciates to any extent the dangers of the Roman Catholic political machine in this country, can find the truth in this RECORD.

I am not fighting anybody's religion; I am willing for everyone to worship in any way he shall please; but no religious organization, be it Protestant, Jew, or Catholic, is going to form a mighty political machine that worms its way into business and into politics and into everything else under the cloak of religion; a machine which attacks the public-school system, that would reunite church and state, and would open the doors of this country to the unfit hordes of foreign lands, the criminal refuse of Europe; and it is my business as an American, intrusted with a position in this body, to stand and give warning, even if I battle by myself. I know I incur the displeasure of those who do not want to be interfered with. Those who compose that machine laugh in their sleeves at the complacency that they find among many Protestants who are sound asleep. I am fighting for religious freedom and to hold American institutions in their integrity and I am going to continue to make that fight. I owe it to the American people, who are looking to this body to do the thing which is necessary, to let them know of the dangers that threaten.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE THE SINKING OF THE SUBMARINE "S–4"

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4, and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the entire resolution, and ask that the clerk may read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask that my substitute be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The senior Senator from Tennessee offers the following substitute:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the President for the purpose of making any investigation he may desire into the sinking of the submarine S–4."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of this long debate, I would refrain from speaking were it not that my silence might be misconstrued. The fact that this disaster occurred off the coast of Massachusetts and was extensively reported by the press of that State, has naturally created an unusual interest throughout the State of Massachusetts.

During the Christmas recess, while in Massachusetts, I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, in which I told him of the great public interest I had discovered, and, as a member of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, I asked that he call the committee together when the Senate reconvened and conduct an investigation.

I believed then, and I believe now, that it was the duty of the Senate committee, without any resolution, without any act of this Congress, to investigate into this dreadful disaster, a disaster which swept away the lives of 40 brave defenders of our country, a disaster which sent to the ocean bottom six human beings who lived for four days, and who constantly and steadily during those four days were sending a message by the code-tapping system to the rescue workers, asking only one question: "How long will you be? How long will you be?"

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, instead of accepting my suggestion, according to his own statement—and I make no criticism except to tell the facts—called upon the Secretary of the Navy and suggested to him that a commission of experts be appointed by the President to investigate this disaster.

Immediately upon the convening of the Senate, before I or any other Senator could offer any resolution, or before any Representative could offer one, and while my letter was pending before the committee, the President's message was presented to the Congress. It was known during the entire recess that the public sentiment of this country was such that an investigation would be asked for, either by some Member of the Senate or by some Member of the House of Representatives. But for the chief purpose, it seems to me, of preventing above all things a senatorial inquiry a resolution urging a civilian commission was requested.

Mr. President, let us speak frankly; it is proposed that we delegate the power of this body and of the legislative branch of this Government to an investigation by experts into what? What expert question is involved in the disaster of the submarine S–4? What expert question is involved other than is embraced in any accident upon which a jury anywhere in this land hears evidence and renders judgment? This case involves merely the questions of due care and negligence which jurors daily settle. What issue is here involved that requires any different kind of investigation than the most ordinary coroner's jury in any part of this country conducts?

Mr. President, what are the questions at issue? Three major questions would be involved in any inquiry into the disaster of the S–4 submarine off the coast of Provincetown, Mass., on that fatal December day, the seventeenth.

First. Whose negligence caused the collision? Was it the officers of the submarine or the Coast Guard destroyer?

Second. Was the method pursued by the Navy Department in the rescue work that followed the collision prompt and efficient?

Third. Did the Navy Department, in view of its experience with previous submarine disasters, perform its full duty in obtaining all information available and taking all precautions necessary to prevent a reoccurrence of submarine disasters, and did it equip itself with the proper facilities for saving human life in submerged submarines?

None of these questions, it seems to me, involve expert knowledge. If they do, then our jury system of trying accident cases and the coroner's jury system are failures.

The only technical question that I can see involved is possibly one, namely, What kind of apparatus, if any, is it possible for the Navy to possess which would promptly and expeditiously save human life in a submerged submarine?

If others want to consider themselves incompetent as Senators of the United States to determine who caused this accident, and whether or not proper methods were used to rescue immediately six human lives entombed in the S–4, then I decline to be classed in that group of Senators. I deny that these questions are so momentous that only experts can give an answer to the people of the country.

Mr. President, something more than an inquiry into a disaster is involved here. We are beginning the establishment of a precedent that threatens the destruction of the power and the influence of this body. You know and I know to what extent the country has been complaining about the establishment and the growth of bureaus. From all political groups we hear a good deal of criticism against the growth of bureaucratic government in Washington.

Our people are alarmed and disturbed at the extent to which bureaus have been created and expanded here in Washington. They look with alarm upon the wide and discretionary powers which we have delegated to these bureaus which are far removed from personal contact and responsibility to the people. I share the alarm which the people maintain, but we have reached a much more dangerous condition, a still graver danger than the establishment of bureaus and the delegation of our functions to them if we are now to refuse the obligation to hold them to strict accountability and fail to courageously perform our solemn duty to supervise and investigate their administrative conduct.

To whom are these departments responsible? Whom do these bureaus and departments fear? They fear only the legislative branch of this Government. The people properly ask you and me why we voted thus and so, and for an explanation of all our public policies and acts. Are these bureaus immune from accountability to us? Are they not accountable also to the people, and to the people through the people's chosen representatives? Are we to abandon the policy of preserving the remnants of democracy left to the people of America? The only institution remaining to break down and check the natural tendency to usurp autocratic authority on the part of these bureaus is this body, the Senate. Put plainly and briefly, here is the proposition: Are these bureaus and departments to have their alleged misdemeanors and their omissions and their commissions investigated by some other authority than the delegated authority which under our Constitution is vested in the Congress?

I refuse, for one, to be merely a Senator who sits in the Senate to dole out money from the people's pockets to the bureau heads and departments of this Government and seals his lips and denies himself the right to ask, "Have you efficiently managed your bureau or department, and has the people's money been prudently spent?"

If you want to declare that the only function of the Congress is to appropriate money, then I refuse to define my obligation and my conception of a Senator's duty as simply that of tapping the pocketbooks of the American people.

Consider the humiliating position of a member of the Naval Affairs Committee who next month will be called upon to appropriate upon the recommendation of the naval authorities of this Government hundreds of millions of dollars, yet such a member of that committee can not suggest to the Secretary of the Navy that he inform him how the submarine S–4 disaster happened. Are we to be told that is none of our business; that it is not the function of a Senator; that we are here to give money, but we have no business to inquire into the efficiency of the Navy or the methods employed in the Navy to protect human life?

Mr. President, some one recently said—and I think it is one of the greatest tributes recently paid to the United States Senate—that this body is the only safeguard of democracy left in the American Government; that it is the one body that holds restraint and check upon the natural tendencies and excesses of bureaucratic government; and that it is the one body whose inquiries, investigations, and researches are feared by the executive departments of this Government.

Mr. President, I want to say now that this is the beginning of the end of real democracy if Congress abandons to other bureaus the accountability of its own creatures. When the roll is called each of you must declare your willingness to surrender your position in the watch towers, watching bureaucratic servants removed from direct responsibility to the people.

The issue here and now is, are we to abrogate our power, are we to surrender to a bureau of the Government the authority that is ours as representatives of the people to safeguard their rights? That is the real issue involved here. We are not dealing with mere property, but human lives—40 human lives, 6 of them entrapped for four long days pleading "How long will you be?" I say to you that the American people have a right to ask us "How long will you be"—how long must the American people wait for their representatives to have the courage to inquire into this disaster and to fix the responsibility and provide the means whereby it may never, never again occur?

Has it occurred to you that the investigation conducted by the proposed commission may be an investigation of ourselves, that this commission might properly find that the Congress of the United States has failed to give the Navy sufficient money to provide itself with equipment and facilities for rescuing human lives, and that we ourselves are negligent parties to this terrible disaster involving great loss of human life? This, as well as the policy of excessive administrative economy, is possible within the scope of the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is that why the Senator is opposed to it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; but I am opposed to the President of the United States, for whom I have as high respect and esteem and regard as the Senator from Connecticut, appointing a commission to make an investigation that it is our duty to make. I am opposed to being charged by my constituents with neglect of a public duty as Senator of the United States by delegating my plain duty to an executive bureau. You slurringly cry out "Politics." I am amused at the charge that we alone are partisans, that the acts of the average Senator here are actuated by mere partisan motives. I venture to say, sir, that the average man in this body has no greater partisan motives in the performance of his public duty than any President of the United States, Democrat or Republican.

I resent the charge that you, sir, and you, sir, and I are mere partisans; that in the investigation into the cause of the loss of human lives we would seek to ascertain how advantageous it may be to the Democratic Party or injurious to the Republican Party. I resent it with all the power at my command, sir. I say that there is no more partisanship in this body among the majority of its Members than there is in the White House, and I say that with profound respect and esteem for its present occupant. I say it of his predecessors, Democrat or Republican. The men who occupy the high office of President are not suddenly immune from all consideration of party advantage or of party consideration any more than Senators.

Mr. President, I have talked longer than I intended. I simply want to say now what I thought at the outset in December and still think, that it was the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body to start an investigation on its own initiative, without even a resolution of the Senate. I do not know for what business the committees of the Senate exist if it is not to inquire into such charges of alleged negligent regard of human life; and because I believe that, I still hold that it is the duty of the Senate to appoint a committee to investigate this disaster; that there is not a single expert issue here except one and even that involves the possible negligence of the Navy, which is, Did the Navy exercise diligence to anticipate such accidents and provide itself with the necessary equipment, if it could be obtained, to save human life in the event of a submarine accident? If that issue does not involve the negligence of the Navy, I do not know what it does involve. That is the only issue, it seems to me, in the whole matter that can be called technical.

I shall vote for the proposal of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; but I know what it means, and you, sir, know what it means. Since I have been here there has not been, with an exceedingly few exceptions, resolutions to investigate departments of the Government passed by the other branch of the Government. Even when we were seeking to investigate the notorious abuses of the Veterans' Bureau, where the moneys appropriated by the people to take care of disabled veterans were being squandered, we could not get the other branch of the Congress to join with us in the investigation. There is only one body left, there is only one safeguard, one safety valve, to protect the American people against the possible arrogance of executive bureaus and departments, and that is this body, with its unlimited debate and with its open forum. I hope that we shall appoint a committee to proceed to do our plain duty, which is to investigate this matter.

It is not playing politics, but it is political perfidy to neglect one's public duty, to fail to do that which one ought to do, to fail to live up to the obligations of one's office. I consider it one of the obligations of my office to inquire into the manner and the way in which public money is expended, into questions of omission and commission of public duty by those who spend the people's money, into allegations of neglect in the matter of the loss of human life. I have no opinion as to how the accident happened. I do know the public is aroused. I do know that all kinds of charges were made. I do know that 40 human lives have been lost.

Mr. President, I hope a resolution will be passed providing for a thorough and full investigation. I hope and pray that the result of that investigation may be to restore our Navy to its high place and prestige, to that place which the United States Navy has always enjoyed, one of honor, one of respect, one of pride by all Americans. I pray that it will be found that this was nothing but a pure accident that no human means could have prevented and no human agency could have stopped, and that every possible means was resorted to in order to save the lives of the men in that fatal S-4. Let us find the facts, do our plain duty, and proclaim the truth to our employers and masters, the American people.

Mr. President, to vote against a congressional investigation is to declare to the American people that mistakes, inefficiency, or even misappropriations, omissions, and commissions of executive officials is not the business of this body. I resent and resist the policy of alleged breaches of duty on the part of executive bureaus being investigated by other bureaus in the executive departments of our Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it is not common to insist upon a seat on the jury to determine whether we ourselves have been remiss in our duties. The Navy has no right, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] insisted, upon a representation upon the board which shall inquire into the conduct of the Navy. It is not in the interest of a fair and impartial investigation that the accused party shall sit as a judge in that investigation.

All of us know, Mr. President, how helpless an officer in the Army or Navy may be if he undertakes to criticize his department. We have seen Admiral Magruder demoted and attempted to be disgraced because he made some suggestions with reference to the organization of the Navy. We have seen him hounded and abused by two or three social climbers who happened to be in official position at the time when he appeared before a committee.

None of us want this investigation to be a partisan investigation. None of us want any advantage, because there should be no advantage. There ought to be no politics in the Army and the Navy of these United States. There ought to be no advantage, therefore, to either side to conduct an investigation. It ought not to be within the mind of anyone that they are willing to play politics with a shroud, and yet I know and every man in America will feel, if the investigating committee shall be named under a resolution which gives to one man the power to name that committee and put men on it who owe obedience to the person who names him, that there will always be a lingering suspicion that all of the facts were not developed. I should always feel that way about it, and I know that other people would feel that way about it.

I am thoroughly willing to acquit my friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of any intention of playing politics in this matter. I entertain for him a very high regard. I am not unmindful of the embarrassing position in which he is placed if the Executive wants a resolution passed taking the investigation out of the hands of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I am not unmindful of the embarrassment to the party in power which does not always support a suggestion of the President who happens at that time to be the President of the United States. But this is a matter that ought to rise above such a thing.

I do not know whether the men who died by inches, begging for help and asking over and over again, "Will you be long now?" when the Navy went away and even lost the submarine for hours and those men died without succor, could have been saved under any circumstances or not, but I feel that the investigation ought to be made, and made thoroughly, that each and every man ought to have the right to speak his honest convictions without fear of future consequences to his own welfare, and I think that such an investigation would be made by no other than a committee of this body.

I rather hope the resolution will be finally whipped into shape to provide for just that procedure. It is important. It is just as important as anything can be, because one life is just as sacred as a million, and the mothers and fathers of the men who died in that submarine ought to have the fullest assurance that they are going to know whether or not everything that could be done was done to save their boys. Nobody ought to want the investigation to be hedged about by possibilities that there will always linger in the minds of people a suspicion that a full investigation was not had.

I hope the resolution will be so amended that this body will make the investigation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I have a resolution pending before the Senate in the nature of a Senate resolution, I wish to say just a few words on the subject of the amendment now being considered.

I have felt ever since this terrible disaster that there should be a most thorough and searching investigation made by a congressional committee, and that the investigation should not be made through the executive departments, although I have every confidence both in the President and in the Secretary of the Navy, because I know that they are both most estimable gentlemen and most faithful and capable public servants.

But I think the circumstances to be such that the investigation should be made by a committee that has no connection whatever with the Navy Department. Entertaining these views, when the matter was pending before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs of which I am a member, I proposed to that committee that section 3 be stricken from the joint resolution which was passed by the House of Representatives, and that we recommend to the Senate the adoption of an amendment providing for a committee composed of two Members on the part of the Senate and three on the part of the House of Representatives to carry on an investigation of the disaster to the S–4. The particular suggestion which I made, having submitted in a written proposal to the Naval Affairs Committee was in substance identical with the amendment which we are now considering, with the one exception, that the pending amendment provides for a committee composed of three on the part of the Senate and three on the part of the House of Representatives.

I am heartily in favor of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], for, as I have stated, it is in line with the proposal which I had previously made in the Naval Affairs Committee when we had this subject before us for consideration. I introduced only as a matter of expediency the resolution providing for a Senate committee. This pending proposal is, I think, preferable to that embraced in my Senate resolution, and I therefore hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I shall not take much time in the discussion of the pending joint resolution and the proposed amendment to it. I think, however, that the death of the men in the disaster to the submarine S–4, which aroused such deep interest amongst the people of this country, is so important a subject for investigation that Members of the Senate and House of Representatives should have charge of any investigation which may be made rather than a commission such as is proposed by the original resolution. I voted in the committee for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, and I shall vote for it when it comes up for action in the Senate. The death of these men is one of the most pitiable and terrible events that we have had in peace times. It was accidental. Who is to blame should be decided, if determination of that fact can be made.

But, Mr. President, I want to talk for a few minutes about another group of men who are being killed and wounded and being placed in a position to be killed and wounded, as were the men who died on the submarine S–4, without any authority of Congress at all. I have sat here for weeks, now, awaiting action of the Foreign Relations Committee on the resolutions referred to it regarding the presence of American marines in Nicaragua, and for my part I do not intend to remain silent longer simply because the committee has failed to act.

Marines are being sent to Nicaragua by the hundred, and Nicaraguans are being murdered. They are called bandits because they would not sell their ammunition and their right to fight for what they believed to be self-government in their own country. In the current number of The Nation, the issue of January 25, 1928, appears an article on this subject which I believe is more informative as to the real reason why the marines are being kept in Nicaragua than is anything I have seen printed.

I would not be understood as taking the position that the armed forces of this country should not be used to protect American life anywhere in the world, but I want emphatically to declare that I am opposed to using the armed forces of this country to protect the investments of Americans in foreign lands where revolution is rife or where governments are not stable.

The real reason why the marines are being kept in Nicaragua—I will not at this time discuss the question why they went there—is to protect the property of Americans acquired as a result of speculative investments there, and, in addition to that, for the purpose of fastening new and more burdensome loans upon the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is the Senator not familiar with the fact that the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party of Nicaragua united in requesting this Government to send marines there to help them organize a constabulary which would see to it that a fair election was held on the next occasion when they are to hold elections? Does not the Senator realize that that is the reason why they are there now?

Mr. DILL. I am familiar with the fact that the Liberals conceded the presence of the marines in Nicaragua after Mr. Stimson had told them that they would be paid in gold for the ammunition and guns which they possessed if they laid down their arms; I am aware of the fact that the marines have been kept there under the pretext that they were to supervise and safeguard an election, but in reality they are there to protect the property of Americans who have investments there.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is the Senator accusing the distinguished head of the Liberal Party in Nicaragua of selling out?

Mr. DILL. I say that the head of the Liberal Party in Nicaragua did not accept the proposal that the marines should stay there until he was offered gold for the ammunition and guns which he had and he was informed that if he did not accept it that more marines and still more armed forces would be brought and he would be killed or driven out of the country. Sandino, who is called a bandit, was one of the Liberal leaders who refused to do that.

Furthermore, when the Senator talks about an election being held in Nicaragua under the domination of American marines, I remind him that we are doing more than preparing to supervise an election; we are riveting upon the people of Nicaragua the control of American business men who by loans and contracts are getting control of the banks and the customs duties of that country. I say to the Senator that, in my judgment, this is one of the blackest and foulest crimes that has been committed against men who have enlisted in the armed forces of this country to protect its flag and to protect its people.

I now desire to read from the article in The Nation which I have mentioned. After explaining some of the details of the situation in Nicaragua, this article goes on to state:

> There is open talk of a new loan to Nicaragua, on terms which even the puppet Diaz resents. It will be recalled that the marines kept President Diaz in office when he had lost all control over his own country. We did not come to his aid free. We compelled him to buy peace.

And when we bought the peace, instead of paying for the ammunition of the Liberals out of the Treasury of the United States, which of course we had no right to do, we paid for it out of money borrowed from American bankers in New York; and the loan is based upon the Bank of Nicaragua and the customs duties of that country.

The terms of this loan are very interesting. Let me read further:

> For a one-year loan of $1,000,000, Diaz was forced to put a mortgage on the capital stock and dividends of the National Bank of Nicaragua—a corporation with a paid-in capital of $300,000 and worth twice that—and on the entire capital stock of the Pacific Railways of Nicaragua—worth more than the total amount of the loan; to pledge the export tax on coffee, the new customs duties on tobacco, wines, and liquors, and the increased tolls on other commodities; to give the bankers a five-year option on new Nicaraguan loans; and to transfer to New York, for the benefit of the credit givers, the bank's and railroad's deposits—said to be above $400,000. The contract also provided that the money would be used primarily to buy (American) munitions and, apparently, to bribe Moncada—and would be expended under the direction of a special committee of three, two of the three being Americans, one named by the State Department, the other by the bankers.
> That loan expires on March 31, although it includes a provision by which it may be extended for another six months. Negotiations are now under way for another loan to replace it and also to cover the enormous expenses incurred by Diaz in maintaining himself in power against the wishes of his countrymen. Diaz signed that loan contract willingly enough, but apparently the terms proposed for the new loan are worse still—they stump even Diaz, who is reported to be about to resign in disgust. A letter received by a certain large business house in New York from another business house in Nicaragua asserts that the difficulties of the business situation there are not due to war depression but to the fact that the Diaz government is negotiating a loan with certain New York bankers to obtain money to pay the war debts and damages, and the Government does not want to accept clauses of the contract which the bankers demand, and therefore to force the Government to come to terms the bank has stopped all operations with the exception of collecting. This, of course, as they control the customhouse revenues and the Banco Nacional de Nicaragua, establishes a short and vicious circle. Currency is getting scarcer every day, and in the end it will all go to the Banco Nacional, for the customs duties are the most exorbitant ever heard of.
> The business man adds his prediction that the legislature will have to accept the bankers' terms. Meanwhile the state department, supporting the bankers, is demanding that the legislature also revise the Nicaraguan constitution to permit United States marines to supervise the elections. A pretty business, indeed, for the United States of America to be supporting! A fine cause to die for!

Mr. President, I hope that the Foreign Relations Committee will take some action regarding the resolutions referred to it, and I hope also that nobody will think that because there has been no discussion of this subject on this floor for the past few days we are stunned into silence here; that we are not mindful of the fact that American young men are being taken to Nicaragua and are being used there, sacrificing their lives if necessary, to protect the property of Americans, that they may keep it, and, what is more, fasten the more tightly the tentacles of another loan upon the people of that country.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Washington a question, but he has taken his seat.

I do not claim to have given any exhaustive study to this question, but there are just one or two interrogatories that I should like to put to the Senator from Washington.

When a country like Nicaragua has invited an inflow of our capital, and our business men have established industries and acquired interests of one sort or another in it, and the time comes when Nicaragua is unable to protect the lives and property of our nationals within its limits, what does the Senator think that we should do?

Mr. DILL. I will say to the Senator that I think when the Government of Nicaragua or any other country is in such a condition that the lives of our nationals are not safe it is the duty of this Government to use whatever force is necessary to get those people out of that country; and to that extent I have no criticism of what has been done in Nicaragua. What I am criticizing here is not the use of our forces to get Americans out, but it is the keeping of these armed forces there and sending more of them there, not merely to protect the lives of people who can not get out, but to put more lives there to be destroyed, if necessary, merely for the purpose of protecting the investments of Americans there.

Mr. BRUCE. Then the Senator would have our nationals scurry out of the country like so many frightened rats, leaving perhaps every dollar in the world that they have within its limits to be the spoil of revolutionary forces?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I certainly am not in favor of using the Army and the Navy and the marines of the United States to keep our people in every country where revolution breaks out and enable them to profiteer on that country.

Mr. BRUCE. No; not in every country, because it is not necessary for us to maintain a military force in every country. Who ever heard of our sending marines to the Argentine? Who ever heard of our sending marines to Chile or to Brazil or to any other thoroughly stable and responsible country of South America that is competent to protect our nationals and their property?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. Just a minute; I want to answer the Senator. I want to say to the Senator that the doctrine presented here by the Senator would lead us to put our Army and our Navy in Argentina, Bolivia, or any other country if revolution were rife and were destroying the property of our people. I will say to the Senator that we would not do it in a great, big country, because it would mean war.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; if Argentina were Nicaragua or some other revolution-torn, distracted Central American country, I would have our marines go to Argentina.

Mr. DILL. The policy in Nicaragua inevitably leads, if we follow it, to any country on the American side of the world where revolution breaks out and Americans have property.

Mr. BRUCE. That has not been our history. I have just intimated to the Senator that occupations of foreign territory by our marines have been of a purely exceptional character. They have only taken place where there was no other course for us to take unless we were to forfeit the character of a self-respecting government.

Mr. DILL. I want to remind the Senator that never in the history of this Republic has a President placed the armed forces of this country in another country and kept them there for months, almost a year now—not once—without the authority of Congress. There have been cases where a President has gone in to take out and save the lives of Americans; but whenever he has wanted to keep the armed forces of this country in a self-governing republic he has come to Congress for authority. This is the one case where the President has disregarded Congress.

Mr. BRUCE. The question in this case was not one for Congress, it was one for the State Department, a question of recognition.

Mr. DILL. I agree with the Senator so far as protecting the lives of these people were concerned, but not as to the continued occupation of the country.

Mr. BRUCE. There has not yet been any such continued occupation.

Mr. DILL. What does the Senator call the fact that we have kept our troops in Nicaragua, and when some of them encountered trouble we sent down a lot more marines and announced that we would send still more? What does he call that, if that is not occupation?

Mr. BRUCE. We were informed by the de facto if not the de jure ruler of Nicaragua that he or his government was unable to protect our nationals and their property in Nicaragua. That situation was not only brought to our attention by Diaz, the then President of Nicaragua, but also by Great Britain, by France, by Italy, by Germany; and Great Britain practically asked us to intervene, and informed us that she was about to send a warship to the coast of Nicaragua as a place of refuge for her nationals. What were we to do under those circumstances, pray, except to send marines to Nicaragua?

I am glad that they were sent, and I am glad that when they were attacked there was one American officer—Major Hatfield—true enough to the honorable military traditions of his country to say, "With or without water, the marines never surrender!"

Mr. DILL. Oh, well, the Senator can not get away from this argument by beginning to glorify the American marines. I never knew them to fail to follow orders or do their duty; but I want to know whether the Senator places the lives of Americans and the property of Americans in exactly the same class, and whether he puts on the same basis the protection of American life and the maintenance of troops there to enable Americans to make enormous profits out of their investments?

Mr. BRUCE. I deny that that was the motive of this Government. I deny that that was the motive of the President of this country. I deny that that was the motive of the Secretary of State of this country. I deny that that was the motive of any responsible official of this Government.

Mr. DILL. Well, let us not argue about the motive. Let us argue from the facts. The fact is that we went in on the theory of protecting American lives, and we have stayed not only for the purpose of protecting life, because we could have brought our nationals out of there, but we have stayed to protect investments already made, and to permit our American citizens, American bankers to make still greater investments.

Mr. BRUCE. We have remained there for the purpose of supervising an election in a country which has practically never known a free election, and of giving Nicaragua another opportunity, under more favorable auspices than have ever existed in her troublous past, to make of herself a real, self-governing republican community. Does the Senator doubt for one moment—I know he does not—that when we have performed our function our marines will be withdrawn, as they were some years ago withdrawn?

Mr. DILL. I know that if the Senator had his way they would be withdrawn by order of Congress.

Mr. BRUCE. If I had my way?

Mr. DILL. If the Senator from Washington had his way.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh! I do not doubt it for a moment. I do not doubt it for a moment, because I think I know very well, with great respect to the Senator, what his views about such a situation usually are.

Mr. DILL. I wish the Senator would explain that statement.

Mr. BRUCE. One thing is very remarkable to me. So far as I can see, about the only elements in this country that do not approve of the action of our Government in relation to Nicaragua are the extreme pacifists and the radicals. Every time we are compelled to take any international action of any sort the cry of bitter disapproval goes up from these sources, and especially from the radical sources. I sometimes think that the disapproval of our American radicals under such circumstances must be inspired by a certain degree of satisfaction that they find in the thought that our Government is facing a difficult and an embarrassing situation that affords them additional leverage for domestic agitation.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. In the town in which I live there is not one single, solitary conspicuous individual, man or woman, who is usually believed to be a radical, who is not raising an outcry about our intervention in Nicaragua.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator is trying to get away on the subject of radicals and reactionaries. I am willing to debate that with him at some other time, but the question of whether we are to pay for the right of Americans to make profits out of Nicaraguan investments with the lives of American boys is not a question of radicals and conservatives. It may be a question of whether you place human life about metal dollars, but in my judgment it is not a question of radicals and conservatives, except they be radical as to humanity or as to property.

Mr. BRUCE. I say that the present Republican administration is only doing in Nicaragua what every true Democrat in this country would deride and scorn a Democratic administration for not doing under the same conditions.

Mr. DILL. I thank God no Democratic administration ever did do it.

Mr. BRUCE. One did do it. Did not President Wilson twice send an armed force down to Mexico?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and he withdrew them.

Mr. BRUCE. These marines of ours in Nicaragua will be withdrawn in due course. Does any man doubt that?

Mr. DILL. Yes; after they have been there for a year or two.

Mr. BRUCE. We have never gone into one of these turbulent countries south of us except to carry a blessing with us when we went.

Mr. DILL. The blessing of bullets.

Mr. BRUCE. Bullets!

Mr. DILL. The blessing of bullets is not the kind of blessing this country is in the habit of handing out to weaker people.

Mr. BRUCE. Sometimes a bullet in the bosom of a bandit may not be a blessing to the bandit, but it is a blessing to the people whose peace he is harrying.

Mr. DILL. I remember there were certain people in Great Britain, and some in America, who thought that a bullet would have been good for George Washington, too.

Mr. BRUCE. We went into San Domingo, into that distracted country, whose finances were utterly disordered, and with what result, pray? For the first time San Domingo soon found herself endowed with something that might be called a real civilization. We restored those disordered finances. We established law and order. In all sorts of ways we gave helpful and enlightened advice and aid to the Dominican people.

Mr. DILL. I do not want to enter into an argument about San Domingo. I want to keep to Nicaragua, and these investments on which we are trying to profiteer at the cost of the lives of American boys.

Mr. BRUCE. And then, pursuing our usual unselfish practice, we retired from San Domingo and from that day to this she has enjoyed such a degree of peace as she has never before known. We have gone down to Haiti, too, and, for the first time in its history, men and women can sleep tranquilly in their beds at night without any thought of violence.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think we ought to go to China with American troops in order to make it peaceful there for everybody?

Mr. BRUCE. One of the most glorious episodes in the history of the people of the United States was when we went to China during the Boxer insurrection, and our forces, with the forces of other civilized countries, put down that insurrection.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think——

Mr. BRUCE. And so grateful were the Chinese people to us for releasing them from our share of the Boxer indemnity, that ever since, year after year, they have been using the money thus refunded to them for the purpose of sending promising Chinese youths to this country to be educated in our institutions of learning.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think we ought to keep marines in China until they have an election?

Mr. BRUCE. No; keep them there only so long as it is necessary to promote the temporary objects that took us there.

Mr. DILL. But why should we be so kind to the people of Nicaragua, and guarantee them elections at the point of the bayonet, and not do as much for China? Is it because it would be such a big undertaking that the Senator forgets his principle of protecting life and property in China?

Mr. BRUCE. Did we not send a force of marines over to China a short time ago?

Mr. DILL. But did we keep them there for a year to hold an election in China?

Mr. BRUCE. No; not an election. As far as Chinese constitutions are concerned, I do not know that such a thing as an election in our sense is known to it.

Mr. DILL. Would the Senator think we ought to send them to Italy to guarantee an honest election there?

Mr. BRUCE. Of course not, because Italy is a thoroughly civilized and law-abiding country, and a country fully prepared to assume the responsibility in every respect of protecting the nationals of foreign countries.

Mr. DILL. But if they got into revolution over there, would the Senator favor sending American troops there to hold a free election?

Mr. BRUCE. Of course not. We could rest assured that a country like Italy would successfully deal in one way or another with a revolution in a comparatively short time.

Mr. DILL. But suppose she did not? Should we send them into Russia?

Mr. BRUCE. I have no disposition to answer wild hypotheses.

Mr. DILL. But the Senator was talking about principles. He called me a radical, and I want to know how conservative he is now on the principle of establishing order throughout the world with American lives.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not call the Senator a radical. He may assume that I did if he chooses.

Mr. DILL. To whom did the Senator refer when he talked about a radical?

Mr. BRUCE. I say that, as far as my personal knowledge goes, every radical in this country, man or woman, disapproves of our entry into Nicaragua.

Mr. DILL. I do not particularly object to being called a radical.

Mr. BRUCE. I just wish that the committee now investigating those Mexican documents, of which I am a member, could have its power so enlarged as to inquire into how far clandestine correspondence has gone on in this country recently between American radicals and communists, and radicals and communists in Mexico and Nicaragua. I should like to see, for instance, the letters of Madame Kollontai, the bolshevist emissary to Mexico, to citizens of this country during her sojourn in Mexico, which was, I believe, after she had united herself to her eighth or ninth husband. No, I repeat, we may do so at some time in the future—though God forbid—but we have never gone into one of these harassed countries in the Caribbean Sea, or in Central America, except to confer benefits of incalculable value upon them.

Think of our intervention in Cuba. That is absolutely one of the finest things in human history. There was the Pearl of the Antilles. All we had to do was to reach out and grasp it, had the law of brute force been our only law. In the sense of conquest, it was such a prize as had been rarely offered to any people since the dawn of civilization. We went in; we helped the Cubans to secure their independence; we drove the scourge of yellow fever out of their midst; we designed and helped them to construct a superb system of highways; in a hundred and one ways we brought to them the aid which only a highly enlightened and powerful people long accustomed to the workings of free institutions can bring to a recently liberated people.

Mr. DILL. The Senator does not compare——

Mr. BRUCE. Then, with the reservation that we should have the right to go back whenever the condition of Cuba required it, we left her shores. Twice we have gone back, and each time have we returned to our own land and so grateful are the Cuban people for what we have done for them that hardly had we breathed out note of defiance to Germany and her allies during the great war before Cuba, too, declared war upon Germany.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think he has gone far afield in discussing the Spanish-American War?

Mr. BRUCE. I hope it will never become necessary for me to have to rely upon the Senator from Washington to determine how far I shall go, because he is headed much farther in some directions than I expect ever to go.

As an illustration of what our beneficent intervention meant to Cuba, only a few days ago the Cuban Assembly did a thing to which, so far as I am aware, there is no parallel in the annals of the human race. Recollecting what was achieved for their country by that distinguished American soldier and administrator, Gen. Leonard Wood, the Legislative Assembly of Cuba conferred an annual pension of $6,000 a year upon General Wood's widow. Surely the God of nations will not fail richly to recompense the people of Cuba for this nobly generous act. Indeed, our conduct to some of the countries south of us has marked nothing less than a new era in the history of mankind; and the people of Nicaragua will some day, I doubt not, be as grateful to us because of our intervention in Nicaragua and our friendly efforts to place her firmly upon her feet, as are the people of Cuba.

I am a Democrat, but I think that when the administration of my country is dealing with its foreign relations all feelings of partisanship, to which I usually respond, should cease at the water's edge. I would not uphold the conduct of the United States in Nicaragua if I thought it was unconscionable or wrong; certainly not if I thought it was of the rapacious character that the Senator from Washington assumes. But I do not think that any Secretary of State was ever more unjustly misrepresented than has been our present able and upright Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, in this matter of Nicaraguan intervention. Has he done anything that Grover Cleveland would not have done?

Simply because there was a dispute over a boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela, Cleveland proceeded almost to the point of defying the power of Great Britain.

Mr. DILL. Will the Senator let me call his attention to what Mr. Cleveland did when there was trouble in Nicaragua? Will he yield for a moment that I may point it out to him?

Mr. BRUCE. It is unnecessary for the Senator to recall it. It is unnecessary for anybody to recall to me any salient feature of the administrations of that great, popular and party leader.

Mr. DILL. I think, with all due respect to the Senator's memory, that he has forgotten——

Mr. BRUCE. I will not be interrupted for that purpose.

Mr. DILL. The Senator rose to ask me a question and he never has allowed me to answer his question, because he is making a speech in my time.

Mr. BRUCE. There can not possibly be any dispute about the facts relating to the Venezuelan boundary. Cleveland, like his predecessors, was ever mindful of what was due to the rights and dignity and responsibilities of this country in its dealings with foreign laws. None of us has forgotten the famous letter of Secretary of State Olney, during Mr. Cleveland's time, written with reference to the boundary dispute to which I have just referred. The present administration, as I have said, is not seeking to do anything that Wilson did not twice endeavor to do in his relations with Mexico. Nor did either Cleveland or Wilson do anything in our foreign relations that all American Presidents of every party have not been prepared to do when the honor and the safety of our country called upon them to do it.

I had not intended to be drawn into this debate at all, but I could not sit and hear motives imputed to American intervention in Nicaragua without opposing with all the energy of my nature what was said in that respect.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator rose, he said, to ask me some questions and then proceeded to take the floor and refused to be interrupted in the midst of the questions which he was asking. But, I think, with all due respect and regard for the Senator's great knowledge and ability and for his memory of Mr. Cleveland, on which he prides himself, that I will dare to read, for the information of the Senator as well as others, what Mr. Cleveland said about some revolutions in Nicaragua.

Instead of sending troops into Nicaragua, instead of keeping them there and having numbers of them killed and wounded, in his message of December 4, 1893, he said:

> Nicaragua has recently passed through two revolutions, the party at first successful having in turn been displaced by another. Our newly appointed minister by his timely good offices aided in a peaceful adjustment of the controversy involved in the first conflict. The large American interests established in that country in connection with the Nicaragua Canal were not molested.

I expected the Senator from Maryland to talk about the Nicaraguan Canal, but the Senator did not place himself even on that ground, which to my mind gives the only excuse that can be offered for keeping troops there at all and, of course, even that is no justification.

The Senator from Maryland adverted to President Wilson's sending troops to Mexico. I want to read what President Wilson said about sending troops to Mexico. He sent troops to Tampico to protect American lives temporarily, but in a special message of April 20, 1914, he requested authorization by Congress of his action in the following words:

> I therefore come to ask your approval that I used the armed forces of the United States in such ways and to such an extent as may be necessary to obtain from General Huerta and his adherents the fullest recognition of the rights and dignity of the United States, and end distressing conditions now unhappily obtaining in Mexico.

That is another Democratic President who had respect for the Constitution of the United States to the extent that he came to the Congress and asked for express authority to continue to use the armed forces of the country.

Congress met in December of this year, and up to this hour we have had no such request from the President of the United States. We have had an assumption of authority, and that assumption has continued down through the weeks and months we have been here. There is no indication now that this privately conducted war is to end, but rather that the President intends to continue it, and Congress sits supinely by and gives Senators, such as the Senator from Maryland, some justification for thinking that Congress consents to and approves of the President's course.

Mr. BRUCE. When President Wilson decided to intervene in Mexico he knew, of course, that that meant war.

Mr. DILL. What does this mean in Nicaragua?

Mr. BRUCE. Mexico is a country with millions of population, a country with very large resources in every respect for carrying on war, and therefore, when no invitation in any form had come to us to intervene in Mexico, it was perfectly natural that Mr. Wilson should have invoked the full war powers of the Government. But how different is the situation in Nicaragua. Both organized parties in that country welcome our intervention They are only too glad to have our supervision of the election which is to determine which of them is to hold the reins of lawful power in Nicaragua. When Mr. Stimson went there——

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. BRUCE. I thought that the Senator would interrupt me, and I thought that he would interrupt me just at that point.

Mr. DILL. Yes; I do not propose that the Senator shall make another speech in my time. The Senator from Maryland rises and in my time proceeds to make a speech.

Mr. BRUCE. Another case where "discretion is the better part of valor."

Mr. DILL. The Senator will have all the opportunity he wants. I did not interrupt the Senator by making speeches in his time. I might have risen to ask a question. I do not want the Senator to get so far away from the issue as he did a while ago when he went to discussing the war with Spain and glorified the American troops and the American Republic back through its history. I did want to call the Senator's attention to the fact, he having told us that Democratic Presidents did these things, that when Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson, the only two Democratic Presidents we have had in modern times, wanted to use the armed forces of this country continuously in a foreign land they came to Congress and asked for the authority.

I want to remind the Senator of what Mr. Harding also had to say on this subject. In his speech during the campaign which resulted in his election as President he said:

> Nor will I misuse the powers of the Executive to cover with a veil of secrecy repeated acts of unwarrantable interference in domestic affairs of the little Republics of the Western Hemisphere, such as in the past few years have not only made enemies of those who should be our friends, but have rightfully discredited our country as their trusted neighbor.

The Senator justifies at last the troops in Nicaragua because, he said, both parties invited it. The Senator, of course, is in a debate, and men in argument will always lean to their own side of the case; but I must call the Senator back to the history of the situation, which is that our troops went there to protect American lives and American property, and after getting in there they stayed.

Mr. Stimson was sent down there to buy off the Liberals by promising to buy their ammunition and their guns, and then they consented to it. Now, when Sandino and a little band of followers opposed to the intervention of this Government, oppose this policy, they are called bandits, and the Senator gets up here and glorifies the dying of American boys in the name of American investors who have properties there and who want to profiteer on them to the extent of getting stronger and greater loans than they already have.

Mr. BRUCE rose.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator want to ask a question?

Mr. BRUCE. Is the Senator in mind now to tolerate an interruption?

Mr. DILL. I will gladly tolerate an interruption, but I will not permit the Senator to make speeches in my time about the Spanish-American War and the Civil War and the Revolution. If the Senator has a question he desires to ask I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator wants a complete monopoly of speech he may have it.

Mr. DILL. I do not want that; but I do not like to be driven off the floor.

Mr. BRUCE. Notwithstanding his often-professed hatred of monopolies of all sorts!

Mr. DILL. I think I was pretty liberal to the Senator in letting him question me and talk, too.

I do not care to continue the discussion, but I did want to raise my voice in protest against a continuation of the policy which has been carried on in connection with Nicaragua and to call again upon the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate to take some action regarding the resolutions which were presented here some weeks ago. I believe we have waited long enough. I believe it is the duty of that committee to take some action, one way or another, in order that we may have a chance in the Senate to express our views by our votes on this policy of war against a little people down in Nicaragua.

Mr. BRUCE rose.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator want to interrupt me?

Mr. BRUCE. No; I thought that the Senator was going to interrupt himself this time.

Mr. DILL. No. I am only going to say a few more words and then I shall yield the floor.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I have the kindliest feelings for the Senator from Maryland. I have no objection to his personal characterizations of me, because when he adopts that course I know that he is at a loss for an argument with which to reply to the things that I have said, and he uses that means while he thinks of arguments which he may make. So I have no hard feelings about anything he may have said.

Mr. President, I believe there is an American policy which has been laid down by the Presidents of the country through its history. I believe that the keeping of the marines in Nicaragua to cover up the record we have used in Nicaragua is in violation of the precedents and historic policy of this Government. I believe that the Congress should act upon the question whether the President asks us to do so or not.

I shall not take further time to discuss the subject now, but shall probably have more to say at another time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in order not to take the time of the Senate I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD as part of my remarks in connection with the discussion of the Nicaraguan situation the matter which I send to the desk. It refers particularly to foreign debts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The loan made to Diaz soon after his recognition amounted to $300,000. This was repaid out of a subsequent loan for $1,000,000 on March 19, 1927. This million-dollar loan bears interest at 6 per cent per annum and the security consisted of a first lien on 50 per cent of the surplus revenues, plus a secondary lien on certain taxes, a first lien on all dividends declared by the railroad or the national bank (both the property of the Nicaraguan Government) and a first lien on the capital stock of the railroad and the bank. The proceeds of the loan were to be used for the purchase of supplies, maintenance, equipment, and salaries of the armed forces of the Republic. The loan was for a term of one year with a proviso that one-half of the loan might be extended for another six months.

The department is informed that this loan has been rapidly amortized, and the amount outstanding to-day is $538,379.88. A payment is expected from the surplus revenues as of January 1, which has not yet been received, which it is thought will be in the neighborhood of $200,000, which would reduce the loan to about $338,000. It is expected that this balance will be paid off by July 1 next. This is the only money owed by the Republic of Nicaragua to American bankers.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to add merely a few remarks. The real point of the discussion is that in view of the condition of disorder and lawlessness, not to say anarchy in Nicaragua, the President of the United States sent down to Nicaragua an able, accomplished, and highly experienced public man, Mr. Stimson, to look over the situation and to do whatever could be done to bring the warring factions in Nicaragua to a peaceful understanding with each other. Mr. Stimson went. Diaz, the head of the Conservatives, was in control of the Government in Nicaragua or such government as there was. The army of the Liberals, the other party in Nicaragua, was in the field headed by General Moncada. Mr. Stimson got in touch with both of the Nicaraguan parties, the Conservatives and the Liberals. He experienced little difficulty in arriving at an understanding with the Conservatives, and by tact and address of a high order he succeeded in inducing General Moncada, the commander in chief of the Liberal military forces, to persuade all his generals, with a single exception, to lay down their arms and to accept the proposition of Mr. Stimson that there should be a free and fair popular election held in Nicaragua under safeguards prescribed by the United States.

Of all the Liberal generals only one refused to lay down his arms, and that was Sandino, a man who for part of his life had been a mere military adventurer, and who, therefore, of course, could only with difficulty be reconciled to the idea of bringing his calling as a soldier to an end. I say that, carried on as the operations of Sandino have been, they, when considered in the light of his general character and career, can be classed as nothing but the desultory guerrilla warfare of a bandit chief; that is all.

We must not forget that this man was for some years a lieutenant of the Mexican Pancho Villa, probably one of the most murderous, atrocious cutthroats that ever headed a band of marauders anywhere in Latin America. His headquarters, as I understand it, are appropriately enough, a fox hole in the woods. I say "appropriately enough" because he and his like are nothing but feræ naturæ, in my judgment, just as much so as a fox or a wolf or any other prowling animal of the wilderness. He is a mere robber chief, and he and his irregular following alone are now opposing our efforts—our honest, generous, disinterested, wise efforts, and the efforts of the two political parties of Nicaragua to bring peace to desolate Nicaragua.

With Sandino eliminated, there is no reason why our military operations in Nicaragua should not come to an end or why a peaceful election should not then be held there; and it be determined in an orderly and authentic way whether the people of Nicaragua desire that their ruler should be a Conservative or a Liberal.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me if he does not think the benefits of the eighteenth amendment ought to be applied in Nicaragua by the marines? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. No, sir; the eighteenth amendment could not be enforced there, and I will tell the Senator why. Only a few weeks ago Sandino issued a proclamation that he would execute any one of his soldiers who took a drink, but he soon found that he could not enforce his order. That is always the history of prohibition. So he modified his order by grandiloquently stating that he would regard any man who drank liquor as a traitor to his country. In other words, Sandino, like everybody else who has attempted to enforce prohibition, could not enforce it even with rifle or machine guns. So those soldiers of his who were to be summarily shot if they ever took a drink again were let out with the harmless stigma of "traitors to their country," no penalty, of course, of any kind being prescribed for that form of treason.

Mr. WHEELER. I was just wondering why the Senator was so bitter in his denunciation of Sandino; I did not know anything about him; but now I have learned the secret. It is probably because he is a prohibitionist. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps he is a prohibitionist; he certainly is a characteristic one, so far as any ability to enforce prohibition is concerned.

Mr. President, that is the way that the situation in Nicaragua strikes me. I followed the speech on this subject which the Senator from Montana delivered. I usually read his speeches, though I have found when I read them that I never agree with his conclusions. Still I keep on reading them, I will admit, because they are always bright, vivid, and interesting. Then I read that most admirable speech delivered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] on this subject, which, it seems to me, sums up the merits of the controversy about as well as anything that I have read for a long time.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator if he has read the work of the Senator from Connecticut on the Monroe doctrine, entitled "An Ancient Shibboleth"? If he has not read that book, I would commend it to him. It was written when the Senator from Connecticut was a professor at Yale.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, there is a great deal of difference of opinion about consistency. Some one, I believe, said that consistency is the bogey of little minds.

Mr. BORAH. The hobgoblin.

Mr. BRUCE. The hobgoblin of little minds; that is right. The mind of the Senator from Idaho always retains everything that it receives. Someone else has said, "Consistency, thou art a jewel," and then someone else has said that the only men who never change their minds are fools. So the Senator may take his choice.

Mr. WHEELER. I have never known the Senator to change his mind.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no; I do not want to put myself in the same class with the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. And I am sure I do not want to be put myself in the class with the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. I am sure the Senator does not; it is mutual. I believe that is all that I care to say, Mr. President.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, without further discussion on this subject at this time, a letter by John S. Hemphill to the President of the United States, relative to the killing of his son, who was one of the marines in Nicaragua.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. CALVIN COOLIDGE, FERGUSON, MO.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: According to dispatches of to-day—January 3—from Managua, my son, Sergt. John F. Hemphill, was killed in action against General Sandino's troops.

For the death of my son I hold no malice against General Sandino or any of his men, for I think, and I believe that 90 per cent of our people agree with me, that they are to-day fighting for their liberty as our forefathers fought for our liberty in 1776, and that we, as a Nation, have no legal or moral right to be murdering those liberty-loving people in a war of aggression.

What we are doing is nothing less than murder, for the sole purpose of keeping in power a puppet President, and acting as a collector for Wall Street, which is certainly against the spirit and letter of our Constitution.

My son was 29 years old, served 3 years of his third enlistment, survived honorable service through the World War against Germany, only to be officially murdered in a disgraceful war against this little nation.

My father served through the Civil War, both my grandfathers died in action in the same war, and I am proud of their records, so this is not from the pen of a red radical but from one who loves justice and fair play.

I have four sons, and if necessity arose I would be willing to sacrifice not only all four sons but my own life as well in a war of defense, but I am not willing to shed one drop of blood in a war of aggression such as this one is.

You have lost a son and know the sorrow, and we as a Nation mourned with you in your hour of grief. Suppose that son had fallen as my son has, a victim of the greed of Wall Street, would you feel that the financial gain was worth the cost?

JOHN S. HEMPHILL.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine does he expect a vote on the pending joint resolution this evening?

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I do not. There are several Senators on this side of the Chamber who wish to be heard on the joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was going to say that I hope the Senator will let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will vote on the pending joint resolution this evening. I have been here for a week awaiting action on it. I stayed here all day Monday and all day Tuesday and all the other days the Senate has been in session this week. The Senator from Maine has been insisting on a vote on the joint resolution all the time, and said it would take but a few hours to dispose of it. Senators have all been here to vote on it, and I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. HALE. I have tried my best, as has the Senator, to secure consideration of the joint resolution and to have action taken upon it during the week, but on account of the discussion on the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] we were unable to do so.

Mr. SWANSON. We have had a whole day for it.

Mr. HALE. There are some Senators who desire to discuss the joint resolution, but when the debate took another course on a subject matter entirely different and the discussion on the joint resolution seemed to be dropped, some of them went home. I refer to Senators on this side of the Chamber. There are several who wish to be heard on the joint resolution, so I do not think it will be possible to finish it to-night at any rate.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator now that I will not consent any further to taking up the joint resolution until it can come up in regular course by displacing some other measure. I have, as I have said, waited all this week. I serve notice on the Senator that the next time he desires to have the resolution taken up he will have to get unanimous consent, and I am not disposed to give my consent.

Mr. HALE. I think it is a reasonable suggestion that at this hour of the evening——

Mr. SWANSON. It is not yet half-past 4 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I think it is a reasonable suggestion that the joint resolution may be laid aside now. There are other Senators who want to debate the matter, and they have requested that it go over.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say to the Senator that I will not give my consent to having this matter come up until it comes up in the regular way by displacing other business. I do not intend to give unanimous consent. The measure was brought up to-day and discussed, with the understanding that it would be acted on before we adjourned. That, at least, was substantially the understanding. Now that understanding is changed by allowing the joint resolution to go over.

Mr. HALE. I had hoped very much that the resolution would be passed to-day.

Mr. SWANSON. It was my understanding that the joint resolution would be taken up and would be discussed and disposed of.

Mr. HALE. I should be very glad to have the joint resolution disposed of now, but there are other Senators who wish to be heard.

Mr. SWANSON. If they want to be heard, let them be heard. I repeat, I will not again give my consent for the joint resolution to be taken up.

RELIGIOUS TOLERANCE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WALSH OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] on religious tolerance at All Souls Unitarian Church in this city on last evening. It is a splendid speech.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From the earliest days of our history, religion has been closely associated with the principles which brought our Nation into being and has continued its growth and development until this day.

We are a God-fearing people. The first settlers upon the bleak shores, that skirted every harbor from New England to Virginia, were men and women dominated by firm religious principles. They came during the general period of the politico-religious struggle which devastated Europe, which we call the Thirty Years' War, and they settled during the following 100 years of political and religious enmity. Even our later great flow of immigration came from countries in which some degree of suppression of the two most powerful human aspirations had molded men's characters and embittered them.

What were they seeking? Merely the privilege of living their own lives in their own way, inspired by a fervent zeal to be free politically and religiously. Here they flourished and became numerous and strong. Each group established a system of government in the several colonies, always a representative system. They centered their community life around their places of worship. Though the separate Colonies differed in customs, widely in religion, and somewhat in the details of their theory of government, when they saw their self-government and their social system menaced, they united regardless of differences in religion or race, and struck out promptly for independence. After winning their independence through the sacrifice of their common blood they set about to establish permanently, upon the soil of America, those principles which had led them to dare the perils of an unknown ocean voyage, to take up an abode in an unknown wilderness.

Many of the Colonies had manifested prejudice against those who differed with them, but when they were thrown together by a common cause—liberty—they at once realized the folly and stupidity of religious intolerence. Their common ideal of self-government and the Union of the States, for the protection of their inalienable rights against the greed and jealousy of the Old World, brought the dawn of religious tolerance to America. Upon the battle fields of the Revolution men for the first time saturated the earth with their blood for a cause, other than that of merely satisfying the greed and selfishness of self-appointed rulers—a cause that made a subject the citizen and the ruler. Then and there they learned that there was no inconsistency, between strong adherence to particular religious convictions and a spirit of tolerance toward other religious beliefs. Upon this spirit the Union was built. Because we have cherished these ideals we have been blessed by the God of nations as no other people.

Are we to lose this priceless inheritance? Shall the enjoyment of free institutions and the benefits of the expansion and diffusion of religion and education make us forget the lessons of the past and permit the kindling on American soil of conflagrations of hate, prejudice, and bigotry? Never, while the spirit of '76 survives!

Must we throw aside the respective creeds that inspire each of us in our life of religious fervor and lofty purpose in order to live in peace and harmony? America must continue to show the world that her Government possesses the capacity that few other governments have enjoyed—the capacity to settle with peace and justice all the problems of race, creed, and nationality. Here in America it is not for one man to judge his brother in his religious opinions any more than in his social or political opinions. It is an American's inalienable right to use his own judgment in every personal problem of life, responsible neither to man nor government, but to his God. Here we have learned that though creeds may vary and tenets of faith may differ, the fundamental purpose of all religions has been to teach man how to live in harmony with his God and his fellow men, to the end that his soul may be worthy of eternal life; that the message of God to His human family is not restricted by national or racial laws; that the love of God and love of fellow men are one and the same thing. All this is strikingly portrayed in a beautiful inscription on one of our public buildings here in Washington, which reads, "God made us neighbors. Let justice make us friends."

Prejudice and bigotry are products of deficient information. They substitute passion for principle; they destroy patriotism—for patriotism embraces amity; they sow animosity and antagonism and destroy cooperation.

It is not enough for us to be tolerant. Tolerant is an unhappy expression. It suggests "to suffer," "to bear with." Let us cultivate a more positive virtue. Let us speak of good will, which is an indispensable foundation for the brotherhood of man. Every religion rightly understood and practiced is a crusade of good will. America, that has attracted the heroic sons and daughters of all the races of the world, enjoys more than any other nation the unique mission of becoming a broadcasting station for world brotherhood. If America, where there has been the greatest mingling of the races and the greatest experiment of the ages, is to rise to the sublime heights for which we believe she is destined—indeed, which she has already achieved—it is because we have striven to substitute justice and understanding for rivalry, jealousy, and prejudice.

The creed of America is that there is no inferiority of religion and nationality.

Laws, leagues, and courts will never produce good will. They may help, but love, justice, and charity implanted in the human soul can alone make for lasting good will. Religion, all religions, should stimulate love, justice, and charity and abolish hate, prejudice, and intolerance. We are on the way to lasting good will when priest, minister, and rabbi can get together and deliberate not on the major things that divide them but on the major things that unite them. The next step is cooperation. If Catholic and Protestant can not respect each other's opinions, what will a pagan world think of Christianity? If Catholic, Protestant and Jew can not live together, there is an abandonment of that charity which all religions teach.

As in the World War and at the grave of the unknown soldier, we asked not what class or caste or creed, we let down all barriers, we leveled all partitions, so as we move among the living and enjoy the blessings of peace and prosperity, let all these barriers disappear.

We must not confuse what we call religious rights with religious toleration. In this country we need not ask toleration for religion and its free exercise, for it is an inalienable right. We live in a country which happily gives no sanction to bigotry or persecution, and toleration is not an indulgence bestowed upon us by the grace of government, but recognized as an inherent right. Our ideals of religious equality and justice are as fundamental as our love of personal liberty and free speech.

Let us not be satisfied with mere tolerance of our neighbor, but let us make of him our friend. Good will is an expansive spirit that takes in enemies, suppresses jealousy, and embraces rivals; good will seeks the good of all people across all the barriers that caste and class and race can erect. The possession or absence of it is an elemental test of character. I never could understand the religious processes of the man or woman, who would hasten to aid his fellow being, regardless of condition or creed, in suffering or poverty, yet would rob that same fellow being of the full enjoyment of that which was dearer and more priceless to him than anything in life; that for which he would willingly suffer pain and endure destitution, namely, communion with God in the manner his soul prompted. The one is surface or exterior charity, the other is spiritual perfidy.

Religious liberty is nothing more nor less than Christian charity. To be tolerant and charitable is to hate no man, to injure no man, to live in harmony with all men; to assist so far as we can those who need aid, regardless of religious opinion; to practice the duties of citizenship without favor to any religion or religious group, but with due regard to the rights and principles of justice, to which all religions are entitled in a free government.

The tolerant citizen does not limit his friendships and good will to those who only agree with him in faith. The champion of religious liberty is opposed to all political movements that tend to control spiritual conduct, and insists upon confining the jurisdiction of the Government to the protection of the health, happiness, and the inalienable rights to life and property of the citizen.

Religious tolerance, like political tolerance, prompts us to give every human being the utmost concession which trust, justice, and decency permit. No man can be classed as tolerant who entertains in his heart a hatred of all who differ with him on any religious doctrines, or who seeks to deny the American principles of political equality and religious freedom to all his neighbors.

The words "brethren" and "fellow citizen" are synonymous in the vocabulary of men seeking to promote good will and mutual understanding.

We should not take too seriously the movements of lawlessness, bigotry, and intolerance that from time to time appear in our fair land. The great heart of America is tolerant. The overwhelming sentiment of our people is to maintain unsullied our most priceless liberties—freedom of speech, freedom of the ballot, and freedom of the pulpit.

Underlying influences certain to appear occasionally not only against religious liberty but against our very form of government will never penetrate below the surface into the fair breast of the Nation.

We have numerous forces and forms of tyranny and oppression outside the domain of religion to battle against and destroy. Every form of social and industrial injustice is an enemy of liberty; racial hatred is a form of oppression; monopolistic combinations that enhance the cost of living, lessen the purchasing power of wages, and increase the already too great disparity of living conditions between the rich and poor lead to economic slavery; the possession of the country's resources by a limited few may eventually mean for America what it has meant to other peoples of the world, the establishment of a dynasty of wealth instead of a democracy.

If we are to preserve the soul and spirit of America, we must check the present tendency of directing our governmental energy toward restricting instead of enlarging individual liberty; toward bureaucratic instead of popular government. When governments carry this policy to any extreme they cease to adhere to true principles of liberty and to remain democracies. These, and in fact all our great political problems, involve no religious tenets.

The slave mind, which education and religion should eradicate, has no place in a democracy. The slave mind has no vision and can not grasp the necessity of action when inaction means retrogression and disintegration.

The slave mind is found everywhere—on the platform, in the press, and sometimes in the pulpit; aye, it is found in public service and in politics. It applauds the cant of the demagogue and secretly encourages the bigot. It votes for party labels and not principles. It follows blindly party leadership regardless of the purpose and selfish interests of that leadership. It votes for the party program in the halls of legislation and it votes the party ticket on election day, regardless of convictions.

The slave mind remains silent when one should speak, for fear lest the smile of favor of those in high places be lost; it follows the mob—for there are mobs of social snobbery and class privilege as well as mobs of ignorance and lawlessness.

All nations have been cursed from time to time with movements, temporary in nature, hindering the onward march of the spirit of tolerance. When Jefferson advocated the separation of the church and state he was denounced from platform and pulpit as an infidel, though he was at the same time spending his nights on the codification of The Morals of Jesus.

Less than 100 years ago a political party placed a presidential candidate upon a platform having no other ruling principle than an appeal to a supposed prejudice against Freemasonry. Later, masquerading as the American Party, a strong political organization made an appeal to the people in one or more presidential campaigns based upon religious intolerance and prejudice against those of foreign birth. These movements failed because the principles which were espoused were subversive of our institutions; because a people so persevering in its fight for civil liberty will never waver when put to the test in its opposition to religious intolerance.

The American Protestant, the American Catholic, and the American Jew, and the American of no religious creed must stand united in firm opposition to any intolerant movement which deprives any group of equal rights under the law or curtails personal liberty of conscience or religion.

Let us, therefore, live in the sunlight of American liberty, hating no man who, because of his belief, may not agree with us. Let us live in harmony with all men, assisting, so far as we can, those who need our help, regardless of their religious opinion; practicing the duties of citizenship without favor to any one class or religious group, but with due regard to the rights and principles of justice for all.

Let us live in unity with our neighbor and make of him our friend, and remember that what is true of nations is as true of the individual—"Give to the world the best that you have and the best will come back to you."

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JAMES E. WATSON

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech delivered over the radio by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], Saturday evening, November 5, 1927, at New York City, on the subject of the achievements of the Federal Radio Commission.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE RADIO COMMISSION

It is my first duty, as well as my first pleasure, to make my grateful acknowledgments to Mr. Merlin H. Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Co., for this opportunity to present as fully as possible within the brief time allotted to me the achievements of the Federal Radio Commission.

I am not a radio engineer and I shall not venture to discuss the complex problems involved in that phase of radio transmission. Nor shall I attempt to set forth the use and the importance of this great agency in our present daily affairs; its educational and cultural advantages; its utilization by business concerns of every character and by farmers and others interested in the dissemination of information regarding all the problems relating to our farm life; the pleasure and enjoyment it brings to seven millions of American homes that may listen to instruction every day and to entertainment every night by the best the Nation affords. This agency by its ship-to-ship, its ship-to-shore, and its shore-to-ship communications almost revolutionized ocean transportation, rescuing hundreds of lives and saving millions in money before broadcasting was dreamed of. Since that it has become the source of enjoyment to the youth, of entertainment and culture to those of middle life, and of comfort and consolation to the aged of our land, and has woven itself inextricably into the very fiber of our civilization. Nor shall I attempt to portray the mysteries of this force which has been projected to 500 feet of firm rock and a dozen feet of solid lead, a force by means of which the voice of the orator and of the prima donna may be heard across the continent swifter than the coming light. Certainly it is renewed evidence of the sublime fact that "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

NOT BROADCASTING ALONE

As a whole, the public knows more about broadcasting than any other phase of radio transmission, but it is by no means the sole subject with which the commission has been compelled to deal. The law of 1927 places all the uses of radio, except alone those of various governmental departments, under the jurisdiction of the commission. These uses include all point-to-point stations, which form of transmission is yet in its infancy, but which is destined to become of tremendous importance in the immediate future, 2,000 ship stations, 200 experimental stations, 16,000 amateur stations, 340 land communication stations, and more than 100 technical and trade-school stations, with a great host of people clamoring all the while for a more efficient service and with an ever-increasing number demanding an opportunity to "get on the air."

The radio act of 1927 became law on February 23 of this year. In substance, it provides that no apparatus shall be used within the United States or its possessions to transmit energy or communications by radio except under Federal license. Authority to issue, withhold, modify, or revoke radio licenses, and to make such regulations regarding radio transmission as are necessary in the public interest, is vested by the law in the commission for a period of one year from its first meeting, March 14, 1927.

The law gives great discretionary power to the licensing authority. It is directed to issue licenses to applicants "if public convenience, interest, or necessity will be served thereby," and thus it is their duty to determine whether the public convenience, necessity, or interest served by any given radio station is sufficient to offset the crowding which such a station inevitably causes in the limited number of available wave lengths.

Similarly, the licensing authority may make changes in the wave lengths, authorized power, or hours of operation of any radio station if, in its judgment, "such changes will promote public convenience or interest or will serve public necessity." The power to revoke licenses is given "for failure to operate substantially as set forth in the license" and for various other specified causes.

This, in brief, is the legal foundation upon which the Federal Radio Commission undertook its work. The exact nature of the task which faced it can best be understood if we look for a moment at what had happened to American radio broadcasting during the eight months immediately preceding the passage of the radio act of 1927.

CONDITIONS WHEN COMMISSION TOOK CHARGE

On June 30, 1926, there were under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce 535 licensed broadcasting stations. Even with that number radio reception was by no means satisfactory, and the department was disapproving practically all requests for new licenses, for changes of frequency or for power increases, on the unchallengeable ground that there was no more room.

Then, most unexpectedly, came the decision by a Federal court in the Zenith case, followed by an opinion of the Attorney General based on it, making it evident that the Department of Commerce had no recourse but to approve any and every application made to it. Secretary Hoover did everything possible for any individual to do to preserve order, as well as private and public rights, in this great field of activity, but his hands were securely tied and he was rendered practically helpless by this decision effectively to serve the public. The Government issued a warning and an appeal, pointing out that public interest absolutely required the maintenance of the radio situation approximately unchanged until a new law was enacted by Congress, and this appeal was seconded by practically all the responsible organizations connected with radio.

Despite these warnings there followed nearly eight months of wholesale "air piracy." Public opinion was most vehement against the "wave jumpers," but, as a matter of fact, they were not the ones responsible for the greatest trouble. Of the 535 broadcasting stations licensed as of June 30, 1926, there were only 86, or 16 per cent, who took advantage of the situation to change their frequencies.

Far more numerous, if not individually so troublesome, were the "power jumpers," 168 in number, or 31 per cent of the whole. Since 40 broadcasters changed both power and frequency, the total number of those who helped themselves during the eight months' period to privileges which had been denied them before the breakdown of regulation was 214, or 40 per cent of the entire list. Twenty-seven stations by some happy miracle, dropped out; the remainder, 294, or 55 per cent took no advantage of the situation.

RESULTING CHAOS

After the decision in the Zenith case, practically holding that nobody had any right to any wave length and that the Secretary of Commerce had no authority to bestow any such right, there was an indiscriminate scramble on the part of those who had been denied the privilege of erecting stations or broadcasting on desired wave lengths to take whatever they wanted, and this resulted in a chaos so complete that nation-wide interference and static and heterodyning almost destroyed the usefulness of this agency.

And so it was neither the "wave jumpers" nor the "power jumpers," however, that did the real mischief. Scarcely was the ink dry on the Attorney General's opinion before this wild scramble to "get on the air" began before Congress could act. Between July 1, 1926, and February 23, 1927, the Department of Commerce found itself compelled to license no fewer than 225 new stations. In eight months the total number increased 37 per cent, or up to 735 stations.

In vain were most vigorous protests heralded throughout the land that there were no available frequencies; in vain were announcements repeatedly made that public interest was being ruthlessly sacrificed by the men who were rushing into a field already overcrowded. And it was not until the radio act of 1927 was approved that this utterly disastrous scramble ceased.

PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED

What was the new Federal Radio Commission to do with such a situation? It was easy for irresponsible counselors to say, "Cut out half the stations," but the law made no provision for revoking a license except for some unlawful act or for failure to obey the orders of the commission under the new law itself.

And because congestion still exists and because reception in multiplied instances is now anything but satisfactory we still have multitudes of people who insist on the commission summarily cutting off one-half of all the broadcasting stations in order to give the remainder exclusive use of these channels of communication. But these impatient individuals must remember that there is something else besides the mere physical and engineering aspects of the case to be considered. It would indeed be easy for a competent engineer to sit down and work out a scheme that would solve the problem in accordance with this program, but it must be remembered that there are legal questions of personal and property rights that can not be overlooked if the law is to be sustained.

Moreover, there are questions of justice and fair dealing involved, for the past service of stations must be taken into consideration and it can not be forgotten that those granted the right to certain wave lengths and power and division of time by the commission, even under stress of circumstances, and who because of such grant invested money and established stations and acquired a clientele have rights that everybody is bound to respect. Nor must it be forgotten that the rights of religious bodies are brought into the situation and that the contentions of labor organizations, and other associations of like character who insist on the right of free speech, simply must be dealt with and can not be cast into the scrap heap.

Putting the "wave jumpers" and the "power jumpers" all back where they were on June 30—another favorite suggestion—would have accomplished nothing with regard to the 225 newcomers, who manifestly could not be put where they came from, as they had come from nowhere. They were all new. To make matters still more complex, a few of the "jumpers," and a very few, though not many, of the newcomers, were clearly rendering a real and valuable service, quite within the intent of the law.

OTHER DIFFICULTIES

In recounting the complex and vexatious problems that confronted the commission on its assembling, please remember that Congress, while it established the commission, failed to appropriate a dollar for its organization or its operation or its maintenance. So that when it met to begin its duties it was anything but a going concern. Its members were not even personally acquainted with one another, and the chairman had to call the first meeting by radio and wire from Peking.

There was no clerical staff to handle the enormous volume of mail that poured in. The entire organization, necessarily very limited because of lack of adequate funds, even to provide a sufficient corps of stenographers and clerks, to say nothing of technical aides, had to be built up by the commissioners while they were carrying on the work, for the public demand for immediate action was so strong and so entirely legitimate that delay was out of the question.

The commission's first step was to segregate broadcasting from all other forms of radio activity, in order to give it immediate and practically exclusive attention. It is by no means clear that broadcasting is the most important part of the field covered by the radio act, but certainly it was the part which, from the standpoint of public convenience, necessity, and interest, most urgently required action.

Then, in order to get the full benefit of the country's best-informed opinion on the subject, the commission arranged for a general public conference, to be held in Washington late in March, in the hope that suggestions might be there presented for the solution of the problem.

The conference was a magnificent success in showing the commission just how difficult its task was, for there was a confusion of tongues there almost equal to the worst static. We were most forcefully reminded by the varied interests represented that the commission must on no account widen the broadcasting band, that it must maintain a separation of at least 10 kilocycles between adjacent channels, that it must keep stations in the same community fully 50 kilocycles apart, that it must not require too much division of time, that it must not prohibit the use of high power, that it must not put more than a very limited number of stations on the same frequency. Only one question, reiterated by the commissioners over and over again, remained unanswered: "How can all these admirable things be done?"

Meanwhile the 60 days which the radio act set aside as a period of grace were passing by; on April 24 every broadcaster in the country, unless relicensed, might contemplate the choice between a fine of $5,000 and five years in the penitentiary, the penalties provided by law for broadcasting without a license. Accordingly, as the applications for new licenses came in, the commission issued temporary permits, good only until revoked or superseded.

The commission had prepared and mailed to all broadcasters the forms for application for new licenses, and these forms, executed under oath, provided much of the information upon which any new general reallocation could be undertaken until all of the 733 licensed broadcasters and the 300 or 400 new applicants had filed these forms with the commission, and there was no way of compelling anyone to file them before the 60 days of grace were up on April 24. As a matter of fact, it was April 27 before the commission had in hand the material necessary as the basis for a general reallocation, and so, in order that broadcasting might go on for the next few weeks, the commission issued its temporary permits on the old basis, except in two respects.

TWO TROUBLESOME QUESTIONS

During the uncontrolled period a number of broadcasters had deliberately violated the agreement entered into with Canada whereby 6 of the 91 broadcasting channels were to be reserved exclusively for Canadian use. No temporary permits were issued for these channels, and their complete and immediate clearance was the commission's first definite achievement. Furthermore, about 120 stations had elected to operate on "split frequencies"—that is, on frequencies less than 10 kilocycles removed from the nearest authorized one—so that each one was causing interference on at least two wave lengths. All of these wandering souls, under the temporary permits were put where they would make a little less trouble.

All the broadcasting applications were received and the temporary permits issued by April 27. Then began the work of reallocation. In theory it would have been desirable for every station to have appeared before the commission and set forth its claims before it was reassigned, but such hearings, even at the rate of two or three a day, would have consumed more than a year, and meanwhile the public would have had no vestige of relief.

It was determined, therefore, to set up, as a basis for future developments, an immediate reallocation based on such evidence of ability to serve the public as was then available. That such an arrangement, involving more than 730 broadcasting stations, would be far from ideal was perfectly obvious.

The making of this reallocation was a stupendous task, for not only did the evidence regarding the public service rendered by each of the stations have to be weighed, but a place had to be found for each one consonant with its apparent merits, clear of local overlapping, and reasonably free from distant heterodyning.

THE REAL WORK BEGUN

The new allocations were announced on May 24, four weeks after the applications were all in hand, and went into effect on June 15. There was protest on the part of some of the broadcasters, but the authority of the commission remained essentially unchallenged, and the allocations of June 15, modified in individual instance, appear to have established themselves beyond question as the basis for the future development of American broadcasting service, though many changes and reallocations have since been rendered necessary by sheer force of circumstances.

On May 27 began the period of public hearings, a period which will continue throughout the life of the commission. Any broadcaster who is dissatisfied with his assignment of frequency, or of power, or of time division may apply for any change he wishes, provided only that his application specifies the exact frequency, power, or time he desires.

Since it is obvious that no such application can be granted without injury to some other station, every wave length being packed to capacity, each hearing becomes a definite contest among two or more parties, and in this way the relative claims of the stations, on the basis of public service, are brought out. The same thing applies to interference between stations; definite machinery has been set up for hearings to remedy such conflicts.

Between May 27 and October 15 the commission held some 70 of these public hearings, most of them in Washington, although a few hearings were held by individual commissioners at distant points, thus giving everybody an opportunity to be heard. As most hearings have involved at least two stations, and some of them as many as half a dozen, it follows that through this agency something like 150 broadcasting stations have already appeared before the commission and publicly placed on the records, under oath, their statements as to what they have done and are doing to serve public interest, convenience, or necessity. The fact that every hearing is open to the public has been of great value in bringing every application, and also every valid opposition to it, out into the open. The commission has not done its work behind closed doors.

The hearings have provided the commission with a vast amount of information, and in accordance with it many changes have been made in the original allocations of June 15. Furthermore, practical experience, which is the only sure guide in such matters, has shown many cases of serious interference, and in such cases, wherever possible, the commission has acted under the "public convenience, necessity, or interest" clause of the law; and by changes of wave lengths, reduction of power, or further division of time has taken steps to reduce interstation interference to a minimum. This process is constantly going on; every day or two the commission announces one or more changes, all designed for the single purpose of providing better radio service to the American listener.

RESULTS SUBSTANTIAL AND DEFINITE

It should be made clear that, in the present stage of radio engineering, no ideal condition for all the broadcast listeners is conceivable. It would require 10,000 broadcasting stations on the air to give all the listeners what they want when they want it, and then nobody could hear anything at all. The aim of the commission is to give every part of the United States a reasonable variety of broadcast service, dependable and free from abnormal interference, and at the same time to safeguard the rights of the broadcasters in so far as they do not conflict with the rights of the listeners.

In some ways the greatest achievement of the commission has been the extraordinary improvement in the work being done by the broadcasters themselves. Knowing that the commission will judge them solely on the standard of public service, they have made notable changes in the character of their programs, and the records of the commission are full of instances in which, as soon as the commission's policy was made known, broadcasters hastened to replace programs of trashy entertainment by ones of real public value. Furthermore, the insistence on a strict maintenance of the assigned frequency has resulted in a marked improvement in the character of radio transmission. Whereas last February only a very few stations were equipped with adequate devices for staying on their wave lengths, there were to-day very few stations of any importance which have not such equipment.

Such, in brief, has been the work of the Federal Radio Commission during its first months. Much could be said of the loyal work done by its far too small clerical staff, of the generous aid given to it by the leading scientists and engineers of the radio industry, of the splendid support of the press, of the fine cooperation of most of the broadcasters themselves, of the invaluable assistance given by other branches of the Federal Government.

Its most serious handicap—more disturbing by far even than its shortage of funds—was the prolonged illness and death of one of its five members, Col. John F. Dillon, whose long experience, shrewd judgment, and unswerving courage were an incalculable help to his colleagues throughout the first 12 weeks; and very recently the unexpected resignation of Henry H. Bellows, who because of previous knowledge and experience and an ardent love of the cause had become one of the most useful members of the commission and one of the best-informed men on the subject in the whole country.

The commission is by no means inclined to overestimate its achievement so far; it recognizes that there is much even in the broadcasting field yet to be done, and the other and potentially greater field of point-to-point communication is as yet practically untouched. It feels, however, that it has definitely established its own authority to serve the public and that it has provided a basis for a progressive and orderly clearing up of the radio situation. More than this, it hopes that in the performance of its difficult task it has won the confidence and good will of the broadcasters, of the radio industry, and, most of all, of the public. It is on the basis of public confidence that it has carried out the task intrusted to it by Congress in the administration of a very notable piece of national legislation, the radio act of 1927.

And it is my deliberate judgment, after a careful survey of the entire situation, that the Radio Commission has fully justified its creation and that, notwithstanding the many disappointments that its decisions have occasioned, it ought to and will receive the unstinted support of a grateful people.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, although I am a member of the committee, I was unable to be present in the committee when the appropriation for aircraft in commerce was considered. I made inquiry of one of the members as to whether the request of the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics of a sufficient sum to carry out the provisions of the air commerce act had been granted by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. To what page does the Senator refer?

Mr. BINGHAM. Page 52. I was informed that it had been granted. I regret very much that I was misinformed in the matter, because I should have liked to lay the matter before the committee. When I was informed that his request had been granted I said nothing about it, and had my attention called to it only a few moments ago by the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics.

The paragraph on page 51, under the heading, "Aircraft in commerce," is the paragraph which includes the very appropriation for making possible that inspection of aircraft which the framers of the air commerce act and Congress at the time it was passed believed would do more than anything else to increase safety in the air. I think all of us will agree——

Mr. JONES. I will accept the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to have the amount increased to the amount the Budget recommended, namely, $702,000 instead of $662,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means that he wishes to have the $662,000, in line 11, page 52, increased to how much?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Budget recommended $702,000; and I think we will all agree that the Budget officer is sufficiently "hard-boiled" not to recommend anything which he thinks is not absolutely necessary. I should like to increase the amount from the $662,000, which the House passed, to $702,000, which is what the Budget recommended; and the chairman of the committee says he will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent that the clerks be permitted to change the totals to correspond to the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MONEY ADVANCED BY NEVADA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller General of the United States in response to Senate Resolution 106, agreed to January 11, 1928, reporting relative to reimbursement of money advanced and expended by the Territory or State of Nevada and assumed by said State in aid of the Government of the United States during the War between the States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 744) to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, in accordance with the previous order, until Monday, January 23, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, January 20, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God and our Father, we thank Thee that Thou art the accessible and holy authority for all who come unto Thee. We would be earnest seekers for the power of the spirit of service to fulfill the duties and the privileges of to-day. Lift us far above all blame and need of praise by inspiring us to make our lives noble, our love of country sacred, our loyalty beyond question, and our achievements a rebuke to ease. Blessed Lord God, help us to live among men as builders of all that tends for stability, order, and the very best productiveness in human life. Strengthen our ties of fraternity, broaden our scope of charity, and may our simple, holy faith have a fine fruition in all hearts. After a long while let us rest where all night is past and where the day has dawned forever. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9481, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one hour.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will try as best I can, and as briefly as possible, to point out some of the salient features of the bill now before the committee for its consideration.

In presenting the independent offices appropiration bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, I desire to make the following statement:

The bill embraces regular annual appropriations for the office of the President and for the independent establishments of the Government, and its order and arrangement follow the general outline submitted by the President in the Budget for the fiscal year 1929.

A detailed tabulation will be found at the end of this report showing the amounts appropriated for the fiscal year 1928, the Budget estimates for 1929, the amount recommended to be appropriated in the bill for 1929, together with the increase or decrease in appropriations and estimates as compared with the amounts recommended in the bill.

APPROPRIATIONS AND ESTIMATES

The Budget estimates upon which this bill is based were submitted by the President in the Budget for the fiscal year 1929 and will be found in detail in Chapter II of that document, pages 31 to 112, inclusive, aggregating $527,553,802.

The total appropriations for the independent offices provided for in this bill for the fiscal year 1928 amounted to $533,908,414.

The amount recommended to be appropriated in the accompanying bill for the fiscal year 1929 is $526,193,111, which sum, compared with the regular annual and deficiency appropriations for 1928 and the estimates for 1929, is as follows:

It is $7,715,303 less than the total of the 1928 appropriations, and it is $1,360,691 less than the estimates submitted for 1929.

In addition to the appropriations above mentioned permanent annual and indefinite appropriations made without annual action by Congress for the fiscal year 1929 are as follows:

Relief of indigent in Alaska	$15,000
Federal Board for Vocational Education	7,367,000
Federal Power Commission	8,250
Federal Reserve Board	2,700,000
Smithsonian Institution	60,000
Veterans' Bureau	74,500,000
Total	84,650,250

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Under the Office of the Executive appropriations are made for the salaries of the President and Vice President and for personal services in the office of the President. In addition, there are appropriations for contingent and traveling expenses, printing and binding, the upkeep and care of the Executive Mansion and grounds, and the White House police.

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

For the office of the Alien Property Custodian the committee recommends a change in the language of the paragraph providing for the expenses of this activity. Under the terms of the Winslow Act the Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to make certain charges in the handling of trust funds and other properties, and as a consequence the cost of the work of this establishment has become self-sustaining. The language recommended by the committee is as follows:

All expenses of the office of the Alien Property Custodian authorized by the act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, including compensation of the Alien Property Custodian at not to exceed $10,000 per annum, shall be paid from interest and collections on trust funds and other properties under the control of such custodian.

The provisions of the above paragraph limit the maximum compensation of the Alien Property Custodian to $10,000 per annum, which heretofore has been at the rate of $7,500 per annum.

There is submitted herewith a statement showing all receipts and disbursements of the Alien Property Custodian from 1918 to October 31, 1927, inclusive:

I wish to say in passing that the present officer in charge of alien property has carried out to the letter the provisions of the Winslow Act in making the office of the Alien Property Custodian self-supporting. A reference to the hearings in this matter will show that the office of the Alien Property Custodian has been conducted at far less expense, in proportion to the amount of assets on hand and the responsibilities involved, than at any time heretofore.

I see by reading the RECORD that some one raised the point that the proposed increase in salary of the Alien Property Custodian, increasing the salary to $10,000, is subject to a point of order. I think if this point is raised when we come to a discussion of the bill in detail, it will be easily determined it is not subject to a point of order, for the reason that the office of the Alien Property Custodian is not under civil service, is not subject to reclassification, and in consequence the Alien Property Custodian could fix salaries ad libitum. For the purpose of making it perfectly within the rule, a limitation has been fixed upon the salary of the Alien Property Custodian at $10,000, and, in my opinion, if there is anybody whose work is worthy of the hire and worthy of the compensation that has been fixed, it is the work that has been done by the Alien Property Custodian.

To indicate the volume of work of the office of the Alien Property Custodian, the following statement is submitted showing the number and disposition of claims filed up to October 31, 1927:

AMERICAN BATTLE MONUMENTS COMMISSION

The $3,000,000 program of the American Battle Monuments Commission to provide for the erection of suitable memorials commemorating the services of the American soldier in Europe is well stabilized and the project consists of eight chapels to be erected in overseas cemeteries; three large memorials and five smaller memorials commemorating the combat activities of the Army; one memorial for the service of supply; two large memorials and three smaller memorials commemorating the work of the Navy; one joint Army and Navy memorial to be erected in Rome; and two bronze tablets. The names and locations of the cemeteries in which memorials will be erected are as follows:

Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, near Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, France.

St. Mihiel American Cemetery, near Thiaucourt, France.

Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, near Fère-en-Tardenois, France.

Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, near Belleau, France.

Somme American Cemetery, near Bony, France.

Flanders Field American Cemetery, near Waereghem, Belgium.

Suresnes American Cemetery, at Suresnes (near Paris), France.

Brookwood American Cemetery, at Brookwood, England.

With reference to memorials outside of the cemeteries, the three largest ones will be erected at Montfaucon, on Montsec and near Chateau-Thierry, France. The five smaller battle-field monuments will be located as follows:

On Blanc Mont Ridge, in the Champagne region.

Near Bellicourt.

At Cantigny.

At Audenarde, near Ypres. The last two places mentioned are in Belgium and the others in France.

In the city of Tours, France, a monument will be erected to the services of supply.

One of the large naval memorials will be erected at Brest, France, and the other in England. The three smaller naval memorials will be located at Gibraltar, at Corfu, Greece, and at Ponta Delgada, in the Azores; and as stated before, a joint Army and Navy memorial will be placed in Rome, Italy.

The two bronze tablets referred to will mark, respectively, the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces at Chaumont, France, and the headquarters of the First Army, at Souilly, France.

It is hoped that this program may be completed by the end of the fiscal year 1930.

For the current fiscal year authority was granted the commission to prepare and publish a guidebook detailing the operations of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe. This book was completed in time for the American Legion Convention held in Paris last September, and to date approximately 17,000 copies have been sold.

It will be interesting to the committee for me to state that during the present summer a majority of the committee, of which I am the chairman, visited several of these sites. It is gratifying to an American in going to these cemeteries and over these battle fields to find that the places where our soldier boys are buried—those who participated in these battles and who belonged to the Army of the United States—are better cared for than those of any of our allies.

When we were there they were just supplanting the white crosses that were erected at the time of their burial with marble crosses, upon each one of which is inscribed the name of the soldier, his regimental or Army assignment, and the State whence he came.

There are 30,000 soldiers buried in these five principal cemeteries in France. They are still finding bodies over there. Those of you who have visited the battle fields, especially the fields that were wooded, know that the timber was entirely killed as a result of the battles, but that immediately thereafter an undergrowth grew up that is as dense as can be imagined. The bodies that are now being found—and five of them were found while we were over there—are found for the most part in this undergrowth; and it may be interesting for you to know that through the ingenuity and the sense of propriety and desire of those in charge of our cemeteries to find all that can possibly be found, they have trained dogs to locate these remains; and more than 90 per cent of these skeletons—and they are only skeletons that now may be found—can be identified.

Fortunately the American Army adopted many ways and means of identification. By the little tags or markers they had, or by their teeth, or by this or that deformity, they have been able, as I say, to identify more than 90 per cent of the remains that are now being found, and therefore there are but very few that are being placed in the graves for the unknown.

In one of these cemeteries five women are buried, three of them killed by bullets in battle and the other two dying of disease.

All are being splendidly cared for, and it is a great compliment to the United States to know that we are thus caring for our dead.

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE

The committee recommends an appropriation of $2,300,000 for continuing the construction of the Arlington Memorial Bridge across the Potomac River at Washington. The bridge as designed will be a low, level, segmental arch bridge with nine arches, the center span being 185 feet long. The work is progressing satisfactorily, the foundations and substructure being practically completed. A contract for the superstructure is being entered into, and the stone for the superstructure in large part has already been delivered, cut and ready for use. It is contemplated that the bridge will be completed and ready for use in the spring of 1931. The following statement indicates appropriations and expenditures and proposed obligations:

BOARD OF MEDIATION

Appropriations for the Board of Mediation are recommended by the committee in accordance with the estimates submitted in the Budget. During the fiscal year 1927 the board received 265 separate applications for its services in the adjustment of differences between carriers and employees organizations, which number involved 42 railroad labor organizations and 208 carriers. Of the 265 cases submitted, 116 had been adjusted by the end of the fiscal year. Of these, 57 cases were settled through mediation, 32 cases were submitted to arbitration, 15 cases were withdrawn through mediation, 9 cases were withdrawn voluntarily, and in 3 cases it was not shown that they were subject to consideration in mediation proceedings.

I think that is a splendid showing and well warrants the legislation. I am happy to state that this activity, like many others, depends for success on its management. I think they have one of the best men at the head of this concern that we could possibly, have for nature seems to have made him for mediation. I refer to our old colleague Samuel Winslow. [Applause.]

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

Appropriations for the Board of Tax Appeals are recommended in accordance with the Budget estimates, aggregating $720,740, which sum represents an increase of $7,960 over the amount available for the current fiscal year. This increase is to provide for the printing and binding of decisions of the board.

As of November 30, 1927, there had been filed a total of 32,598 cases, of which 13,776 had been disposed of. Awaiting trial and at issue there are 16,310 cases, with 1,615 cases pending before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, making a total of 17,925 cases on the docket awaiting trial by the board. For the current fiscal year a substantial increase was appropriated for additional personnel to enable the board to keep pace with the number of cases being filed. This situation is rapidly improving, and settlement of pending cases is being brought to date. This is best evidenced by the fact that for the calendar year 1925 but 995 cases were disposed of by formal findings of fact and written opinions, during the year 1926, 990 cases were disposed of, and for the calendar year 1927 a grand total of 2,000 formal cases were closed. The board is now operating about eight months in arrears.

BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY

To provide for the general expenses and printing and binding of the Bureau of Efficiency, the committee recommends an appropriation of $210,350 for the fiscal year 1929. During the past year the bureau conducted a number of investigations resulting in large savings to the Government through the adoption of the recommended improvements in the method of conducting the business of the various offices, and at present is engaged in a large number of important investigations with requests pending for assistance from other offices.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

In accordance with the Budget estimates the committee recommends the sum of $1,098,752 be appropriated for the expenses of the Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year 1929. This sum is $100,190 less than the total appropriated for the current year.

The work of the commission is constantly increasing and may be accounted for by the natural growth of the country, reflected in the consequent increase in Federal activities and still further represented in the tendency of Congress to place new agencies in the classified service. A splendid example of this will be found in the placing of 2,500 persons engaged in prohibition work under the civil service. For this number of positions 19,000 applications have been received, and additional examiners and clerks were required by the commission. The following statement indicates the volume of work of the Civil Service Commission for the past several years:

In passing I wish to call attention, as the attention of every member of the committee has been called to it, to the examination that was held under the law for the classification of prohibition agents. Seventy-five per cent of those who applied out of the 19,000 failed by reason of the mental test. Whether that mental test was too high I do not know, but it occurs to me that there ought to be some simplified way so that they could get at an honest person with intelligence enough to perform the duties incident to the enforcement of the prohibition act. It does not make much difference whether a man knows what the capital of the Fiji Islands is in order for him to make a good prohibition agent.

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

Appropriations for the Employees' Compensation Commission are recommended in accordance with the estimates submitted in the Budget and aggregate $3,675,000. The sum recommended to be appropriated for salaries is $75,460 in excess of the appropriation for similar purposes for the current fiscal year and may be accounted for by the additional personnel necessary to carry out the provisions of the longshoremen's act passed during the last session of Congress. This act covers the injuries of persons engaged in maritime employment upon the navigable waters of the United States, including dry docks. For the purposes of administration 14 compensation districts were organized, and the increase recommended in the accompanying bill is to provide the salaries of deputy commissioners and other personnel, including expenses of 14 field offices located in the following cities: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Savannah, New Orleans, Galveston, Cleveland, Chicago, Louisville, St. Louis, Seattle, and San Francisco.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The sum of $112,640 is recommended to be appropriated for salaries and general expenses, including printing and binding for the Federal Power Commission for the ensuing fiscal year. An increase of $80,340 in the salary appropriation for 1929 as compared with the appropriation for 1928 is accounted for by the fact that up to the present time the work of the commission has been performed by employees detailed from other departments of the Government. Seeking to remedy this situation and appropriate directly for the costs of this activity, the committee inserted in the appropriation act for the current year a provision directing the Federal Power Commission to estimate for the salaries of employees whose service with the commission had become permanent through such detail. As a result, 28 employees are being provided for in the accompanying bill, their salaries are directly charged to the expense of the commission, and it is now possible to ascertain correctly the amounts expended for the work of the commission. Reductions in the appropriations for other departments have been recommended in those instances where the salary of an employee engaged in the work of the Federal Power Commission was provided from appropriations for that department.

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION

For the current fiscal year an appropriation of $52,186 was carried in the first deficiency act for 1928. The sum recommended in the accompanying bill for the fiscal year 1929 is $80,560, an increase of $28,374. Since the organization and first meeting of this commission on March 15, 1927, 680 broadcasting stations have been licensed, and there are pending approximately 400 applications. The approximate number of broadcasting stations in the United States is 25,000, of which 16,000 are amateur stations, 200 experimental, 340 land and commercial stations, 40 technical and training school stations, and about 2,100 ships licensed by the United States.

The question occurred to the committee that some provision should be made for the future to make this activity self-supporting, and how best to apply the cost, or how best to apply the series of license fees, which is a very difficult problem.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman has touched on a very interesting point, and for his information let me say that in the bill drafted four or five years ago there was carried a provision for graduated fees for transmitting stations—graduated and in sufficient amounts as we thought at the time to take care of the expense of administration.

I do not recollect whether that was in the bill which passed the House in 1923, but it was in one draft, and we dropped it out. I agree with the gentleman that it is well worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. WOOD. In order that we might have something tangible and definite it is the purpose of the Appropriations Committee to ask those in charge of the activity to give us some idea of how best to do that thing. It strikes me that this new arrangement is so impossible to the ordinary mind—this means of transmission which is destined to be one of the greatest factors of communication that the world has ever known should be under some economic financial control.

There are about 17,000,000 receivers in the United States. Of course, it would be impossible, I imagine, to have them contribute, but somebody sells these 17,000,000 receiving sets. They might be made to pay. We have more than 2,000 ships on the high seas. It would be a difficult proposition, impracticable, to include them, for in a large part the great service of the radio with reference to those ships is saving life.

So I say these are some of the few difficulties with which gentlemen solving the problem will have to contend. But it is one that we must eventually solve.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There has been a good deal of criticism of the Radio Commission. I wonder if the committee had any evidence before it in the matter.

Mr. WOOD. No; except in a general way, and the hearings will disclose something about what the gentleman speaks of. The important thing to me seems to have a limit in the number of wave lengths. There are innumerable short wave lengths which for most purposes are quite satisfactory.

A great amount of complaint now coming in will perhaps be satisfied when they can control the wave lengths or else make them correlate one with the other. The subject is too deep for me. I do not know how they are going to do it.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

I desire next to call the attention of the committee to the Federal Trade Commission which we still have with us.

Appropriations aggregating $963,000 are recommended for the Federal Trade Commission for the fiscal year 1929. A limitation has been carried upon the appropriation for salaries and general expenses of the commission, and attention is called to the fact that under this limitation no investigation that does not relate to alleged violations of the antitrust acts may be undertaken upon the request of either House of Congress unless directed by concurrent resolution. This limitation has been amended to include economic investigations. It was developed during the hearings that the Federal Trade Commission has been engaged in economic investigations, not a few of which were undertaken upon the motion of the commission. The act creating the Federal Trade Commission specifically sets forth the powers and duties of the commission, and it may upon its own motion undertake investigations relating to the use of unfair methods of competition in commerce, and to gather and compile information and investigate any corporation engaged in commerce. The testimony given before the committee indicated that many of the investigations directed by the Federal Trade Commission had no relation to matters involved in interstate commerce, merely being economic investigations, and the attention of the Congress is called to this misdirected energy of the commission. The attention of the Comptroller General has also been called to these matters, and it is hoped that further expenditures of Federal funds for unlawful investigations may be prohibited..

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does that broaden the powers of the Federal Trade Commission in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. WOOD. No.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does it contract in any way the powers of the commission under the present law?

Mr. WOOD. No; it just simply calls their attention to their duties under the organic act.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. In other words, you are trying in this appropriation bill, by putting a limitation upon it, to remind the commission of its duties as a body?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. I am free to confess that is what we are trying to do, and if the gentleman will just let me proceed for a few moments I think he will agree with me.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I just wanted to be certain. The gentleman is on the Committee on Appropriations and is able to direct the attention of these bureaus to their duties. The rest of the membership of the House, who are not so fortunately situated as the gentleman, do not have that privilege. I just wondered about the propriety of the Committee on Appropriations undertaking to dictate to bureaus and independent offices, or to the administration itself, even, by expression of this character in an appropriation bill?

Mr. WOOD. I am very glad to answer the gentleman, and I say that I think and I believe that by reason of his long service and by reason of his keeping in touch and contact with the operations of the various bureaus of this Government, he knows, as well as anybody, how prone these bureaus are when once created to expand and extend their authority. One of the great misfortunes of our Government has been the creation of new commissions or bureaus, being given authority under the organic act whereby they may adopt regulations for the conduct of their business. Immediately they begin to legislate. In consequence most of them go far afield, each of them ever trying to extend its jurisdiction and power. The Federal Trade Commission has not been immune from this offense, and to my mind it has been one of the greatest offenders. The Federal Trade Commission, by reason of the act creating it, has a wonderful extent of power, authorizing it to make examinations and inquisition into every corporation and business engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I agree with that statement, and if the Federal Trade Commission personnel were composed of the type of men that were contemplated at the time the act was passed, and who occupied that position for quite a while, I do not think the abuse the gentleman speaks of could be complained of at the present time.

Mr. WOOD. Possibly that is true.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the limitation that has been carried in the appropriation bill, what effect has that had upon the work of the commission?

Mr. WOOD. It has had some effect. It has not had the effect that I think Congress intended it should have, by reason of an opinion that was handed down from the Attorney General's office, written by a present member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. By whom was that opinion signed?

Mr. WOOD. It was prepared by Mr. Myers, written by Mr. Myers.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But it was signed by the Attorney General?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It was addressed to the President of the United States.

Mr. WOOD. And I expect as perfunctorily as most of these opinions are signed. It would be absolutely impossible, as the gentleman from Kentucky will find out sooner or later, for the man who signs these various opinions to prepare them himself, and the gentleman will learn that nine-tenths of the opinions which come from the Attorney General's office, like nine-tenths of the reports that come from the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department, are laid down before the chief and signed by him by reason of the chief's dependence on those who made them.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Of course, at the time the opinion was prepared Mr. Myers, now commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission, was in the Department of Justice?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana to the fact that the Comptroller General prior to the time the Attorney General signed that opinion specifically passed upon the limitation that the gentleman caused to be placed in the appropriation act of 1925, and said:

> This exception has the effect of leaving undisturbed section 6 of subsection (d) of the act of September 26, 1914, quoted above—which section was the one that provided for inquiry being instituted at the request of the President or of either House of Congress. I ask the gentleman if it is not the opinion of the Attorney General and the Comptroller General that the only effect that this limitation has is upon concurrent resolutions of the Congress?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; I agree with the gentleman on that proposition. And that is just the purpose we had in mind in adding the word "economic." The lawyers who are present and who are familiar with the decision handed down in the child labor case held, and properly, as I think, that the production of an article is not a matter of interstate commerce; that an economic inquiry into the cost of production is a thing with which the Federal Government has nothing to do.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If you had the type of men composing the Federal Trade Commission at the present time that the gentleman from Indiana would himself select, does the gentleman think it would be necessary to put the limitation in? Would it?

Mr. WOOD. Undoubtedly the gentleman is correct, but unfortunately we have not had that character of men.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Who is responsible for it?

Mr. WOOD. I should say President Wilson, during his eight years. He had left an awful mess there to clean up.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why does not the present administration clean it up?

Mr. WOOD. When I came to Congress—and I think I may have stated this before—there was a gentleman by the name of Edward Hurley, a member of this Trade Commission, a high-minded, broad-minded, business man in the United States, who proved his worth many times over during the war, and——

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I wish the gentleman would tell us at this time whether there is a single member of the commission now serving on that commission who was appointed by President Wilson?

Mr. WOOD. I want to make this statement first.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes; and I would like to have that information. The gentleman should not forget that.

Mr. WOOD. He told me that he hoped the job I had would prove satisfactory; he hoped that my job was entirely satisfactory. I had no experience at all in it at that time. I asked him what was the matter with his job. He said that when he accepted that position he understood that it was the part of the Federal commission to protect and encourage legitimate business against illegitimate business, and he added, "But I find in practice that I was entirely mistaken." He said it had been the practice of this commission to stick its nose into legitimate business at the behest of illegitimate business. Now, remember that Mr. Hurley was a Democrat, and I give him credit for being one of the best business men in the United States and with having contributed much to the general business welfare of the country. At that time Thompson and Victor Murdock and others were constantly putting into effect resolutions that were being passed by the other body, and occasionally by this body, for no other purpose than inquiring into and trying to break down the legitimate business interests of this country. There is a young man by the name of Myers, a contribution as a Republican to this body who filled the place of a socialistic member whose time had expired, and I confess they did not make any improvement in the appointment.

I think the only recommendation he had was from the Department of Justice, he then being in the Department of Justice, and the desire was to get him out of that body and put him into this one where he might be of still more trouble. That gentleman is now advocating the idea that all the business of this country, so far as corporate interests are concerned, should be under direct Federal control. That is to say, that there should not be a corporation in existence except by license from the United States Government.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield?

Mr. WOOD. In a moment. I will place this whole article in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. I think my question is relevant right there to what the gentleman is stating, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if that policy was not recommended by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Charles Nagel, who served in the Taft administration, and was also recommended by President Taft and Attorney General Wickersham and approved by Judge Gary, who was of the United States Steel Co., with a number of large industrial plants located in the gentleman's district?

Mr. WOOD. I think that came very largely from the gentleman he got the information from.

Mr. BYRNS. I got it from the hearing.

Mr. WOOD. I think that is so.

Mr. BYRNS. It was not contradicted at the time the statement was made at the hearings.

Mr. WOOD. I did not know how to contradict it. It came with an air of truth. But I now know that it is a slander on one of the greatest business men that this country ever knew.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, so far as President Taft and Attorney General Wickersham and the Secretary of Commerce are concerned, they approved it?

Mr. WOOD. I think that is so, so far as Secretary Nagel was concerned, at least.

Mr. BYRNS. I referred to that because it seemed to be the policy of many distinguished Republicans.

Mr. WOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee, Are you willing to subscribe to the policy that every corporation organized in the United States must have the license of the United States Government?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I am not, I will say very frankly to the gentleman. But the gentleman was seeking to criticize the membership of the Federal Trade Commission, and Mr. Myers in particular for his advocacy of such a plan, and I was simply seeking to show that it was not a new thing coming from him, but that it had been advocated by men much higher up in the Republican Party than Mr. Myers.

Mr. WOOD. You have the statement of Mr. Myers to that effect. It may or may not be true. But we have had these miasmas from the beginning of time, and probably will have them to the end. It ought to be the desire of conservative business men of this country, founded on the bedrock of truth, that business should not be killed.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I was asking the gentleman the question, Who is responsible for these unwholesome appointments? The gentleman said President Wilson was. I want to show, and I want the RECORD to show, that not a man on the commission at the present time was an appointee of President Wilson. The gentleman ought not to say so. President Wilson is not responsible for it.

Mr. WOOD. He is responsible for the dirty mess in which we found this situation.

Your man Houston Thompson was one of this same character of men. Your man Victor Murdock, who was appointed as a Republican, was not a Republican except as to the fact that he had the brand on him, for he was really everything else but a Republican.

I am criticizing the appointment of this man Myers, who is a Republican. This is not political with me. I am trying to see this commission either made the agency for good it was intended to be or else abolish it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let me remind the gentleman that I prefaced my question by saying that if the personnel of that commission were what it ought to be, you would not need to put this limitation in the bill, and I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the personnel is that which has been selected by his administration within the last seven years. The gentleman tried to put me off by saying President Wilson was responsible because of the bad situation existing there.

Mr. WOOD. I tried to answer the gentleman from Texas by citing the experience of Mr. Hurley.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why did not your party appoint good men to these offices?

Mr. WOOD. Well, I suspect——

Mr. GARNER of Texas (interposing). Do you not have the material?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. We are pretty nearly perfect but some time or another we make a mistake. [Laughter.] I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas that the whole thing started wrong. Mr. Hurley was appointed in 1914 and this commission was originated in 1913. If the character of men that the gentleman from Texas might have appointed and desired to see appointed had then been appointed and had been succeeded by such men throughout these years there would not be any need for complaint. But here is the trouble to-day.

These gentlemen are passing resolutions and investigating businesses with which they have no concern, and about which there is no complaint, for no other reason than trying to carry out their ideas of what the policy of this Government should be. I want to read you what this man Myers said:

> I believe sooner or later we will have to pass a Federal licensing law for corporations. The Government should have supervision over corporations and the right to say how and where they should dispose of surplus earnings.

Think of such a document as that. I will here insert the article in full:

> MYERS PLAN TO PUT INDUSTRIES ON GUILD BASIS—TRADE COMMISSIONER'S SCHEME WOULD REMOVE FEDERAL INTERFERENCE FROM BUSINESS
> WASHINGTON, September 20.—Big business would be permitted to correct its own unfair practices and ills under a novel plan proposed by Abram F. Myers, Federal Trade Commissioner.
>
> Under Myers's proposal much of the present Government interference would be eliminated and industrial groups allowed to "clean their own doorsteps."
> BASED ON GUILD SYSTEM
> The commissioner plans to form each major industry into a self-correcting and governing body to draft its own rules of trade practices, supervised, if necessary, by the Federal commission.
>
> Myers is starting with the motion-picture industry. A trade conference of motion-picture producers, distributors, and exhibitors has been called in New York next month.
>
> "My idea is based on the old guild system," the commissioner explained. "It is good and wholesome."
>
> "There is no reason why industries can not rid themselves of the ills of unfair practices without arbitrary orders from the Government. I believe, when all major industries are organized, business men will be more content and confident and that the general public will be better satisfied.
> "Those who carry on unfair practices are in the minority and can be quickly brought to terms by pressure from the industrial group. If this fails, then the commission can step in."
> WANTS UNITED STATES CONTROL
> This is Myers's solution for the ills of unfair practices, but for "big business" monopolies, interlocking stock acquisitions, and violations of the antitrust laws he has other ideas.
> "I believe sooner or later we will have to pass a Federal licensing law for corporations," the commissioner stated. "The Government should have supervision over corporations and the right to say how and where they should dispose of surplus earnings."

There is only a dividing line between a corporation and a partnership, and if they were to apply that idea to corporations, in justice, if it were adopted, it should apply eventually and would to partnerships. There is only a dividing line between a partnership and an individual conducting a business, and logically it would soon apply to individuals. It would be paternalism, complete in the Government of the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that, no matter how good an official we may have in a position, whether appointed by a Democratic President or a Republican President, that if the basic law under which they operate is bad they can not serve well? In other words, is it not a fact that the whole Federal Trade Commission act was based on the idea of the Democratic Party, at the time the bill was originally passed, to get at some big corporation and that the framework of this law is so made that you can not have good results under it? I am for the gentleman's proposition to either reorganize the whole law or else drop the Federal Trade Commission absolutely, and one way to do it is to stop appropriating through the appropriating committee, as our Democratic friends stopped the Tariff Commission by not making an appropriation.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In that connection it seems to me that if the commission is to be put out of business or their powers limited, it should be by a direct attack rather than by hitting under cover, and I suggest to the gentleman that in the opinion of the Attorney General and in the opinion of the Comptroller General the limitation that has been carried in this appropriation bill for three years means nothing so far as stopping any inquiry under a resolution of either the House or the Senate.

Mr. WOOD. Well, it does mean this and it has had this effect. Of course, it can be evaded, according to the rule adopted down there by the majority but not by the minority, if a resolution is passed by the Senate or passed by the House in which it is alleged there is a violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let us get back to the original problem that I asked the gentleman about, which was that if the personnel of the commission were composed of men of the type the gentleman would appoint there would be no occasion for any additional limitation or change in the law. Now, if the President has the resignations of these gentlemen on his table, which he requires with reference to members of the Tariff Commission and other appointments, why can he not accept them and change the personnel? Can not the gentleman make such a suggestion to the President?

Mr. WOOD. It may be that after he reads this RECORD he will do something of that character.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Can not the gentleman go to the White House and give the President that information?

Mr. WOOD. I have never been ordered away when I did go there. [Laughter.] I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, that we have one man there that I am proud of, and I think the gentleman should be. He tries to construe the law as he feels Congress intended it should be construed, but he is in a hopeless minority.

In order that you may know what his idea is, I will incorporate in my remarks a brief he has submitted setting forth his position, and he sustains his position by the quotation of numerous authorities and decisions of the United States Supreme Court. If he is correct, and I think he is, these gentlemen have gone far afield in spending thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money of the taxpayers of the United States that has resulted in no good and has not been edifying to the Congress of the United States and has been anything but beneficial to the business interests of the United States.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is referring to the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask the gentleman if Mr. Humphrey in the hearing did not say or show by his statement that if he had his way he would limit the work of the Federal Trade Commission solely to antitrust investigation, and is not that also the view of the gentleman? Do not the gentleman and Mr. Humphrey agree upon that point?

Mr. WOOD. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that. He would limit it to violations of antitrust acts and to investigations for the benefit of Congress as called for by Congress.

Mr. BYRNS. Precisely.

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. But is it not the position of Mr. Humphrey that he would absolutely ignore subsection (a) of section 6, which gives the Federal Trade Commission the right to initiate investigations in the interest of fair trade and for the purpose of preventing unfair competition in this country?

Mr. WOOD. Upon the other hand, he says in his opinion that is the duty of the Trade Commission and that gives them their limit of power. He cited several examples of that. He would limit them to doing the things which it appears to the commission is a violation of the antitrust law, and the Supreme Court has determined that there are half a dozen different statutes that are all part and parcel of the antitrust act and must be considered in connection with it.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, I do not want to misquote Mr. Humphrey, and I think I can find it here in the hearings, but I thought probably the gentleman could save me that trouble.

Mr. WOOD. I can save the gentleman that trouble.

Mr. BYRNS. Does not Mr. Humphrey say in the hearing that of course after Attorney General Sargent rendered the opinion to which he referred, he has been following the opinion rendered by the Attorney General, but if that opinion had not been rendered, it was his idea the Federal Trade Commission should do no more than make antitrust investigations and also respond to any concurrent resolution upon the part of Congress, ignoring absolutely the primary purpose of the act, which was to give publicity to unfair methods of competition and to secure the safety of legitimate business in this country, whether large or small.

Mr. WOOD. Now that the gentleman has raised the question and in order that there may be no misunderstanding of the attitude of Mr. Humphrey, who was long an honored Member of this body, I will read this memorandum:

MEMORANDUM RE ECONOMIC INVESTIGATION RESOLUTIONS

The Federal Trade Commission, by four resolutions—one of which was passed by four of the commissioners, and three of which were passed by three of the commissioners—ordered certain economic investigations.

I am opposed to these resolutions for two reasons: First, I do not think we have the authority to make such investigations; and second, I am opposed to them as a matter of policy.

I find no authority, expressed or implied, authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to make investigations of this character. If we have any such authority, it must, of course, be found in the statute. The Federal Trade Commission act, the Clayton Act, and the Sherman Act, in legal contemplation, are all one law and should be construed as if they were all enacted at the same time. (Brooklyn, etc., v. Prendergast, 7 F (2d) 658; State v. Gerhart, 145 Ind. 439; 33 L. R. A. 313 (320); Lyon v. Manhattan, etc., 25 L. R. A. 402.)

I can find nothing in any of these acts that authorizes the commission "to employ the time and talent of economists" to "develop facts of interest to Congress and to the business world in consideration of important economic questions." I find no authority in the statute for the commission to make investigations except of corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

It seems to be conceded by those who favor these resolutions that the commission does not have the authority to compel the production of information necessary to carry out these investigations. Does not this amount to a statement that we have no legal right to make such investigations?

Section 9 provides, "That for the purposes of this act the commission * * * shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such documentary evidence relating to any matter under investigation."

To concede that any subject matter is beyond the compulsory power of the commission as above defined is to concede that it is outside the powers of investigation conferred upon the commission.

The logic of the statutory grant of compulsory power coextensive with the commission's power of investigation is unimpeachable. The commission's investigations and the reports based thereon are intended to be the basis of Federal action, administrative or legislative. To be of value they must disclose all material facts. An investigation based only on testimony and documentary evidence voluntarily produced, can disclose only such facts as the parties in interest are willing to have disclosed. Such disclosures will always be of but a portion of the facts—such facts as are deemed to be favorable to the parties making the disclosures. But a part of the facts may be thus established, and these are likely to come from persons who are prejudiced and something less than frank. The statute clearly does not contemplate that the commission shall make such investigations or such reports. Federal action, administrative or legislative, can not safely be based thereon.

What could more definitely define our authority to investigate than our power to compel the production of facts pertinent to such investigations? What would an investigation be worth where we could only procure the evidence of those who might favor the proposition? How could we secure evidence of facts that were most necessary, if they were possessed only by hostile witnesses? Does not the power to enforce obedience to our demands exactly measure our legal authority to make them? This seems axiomatic. So as in this instance when we pass resolutions that it is admitted direct inquiries that we can not compel evidence to carry out, we have no authority to direct such inquiries. To argue otherwise, is to argue that we have the right to spend the public money in what may be perhaps an enjoyable performance, but one perfectly idle and useless. If we can spend money for an investigation, where we have no legal right to secure facts pertinent thereto, can imagination suggest an investigation that we do not have the legal right to make? What is the measure of our authority?

As already stated, the Federal Trade Commission act and the Clayton Antitrust Act are all one in legal contemplation. These acts relate only to interstate commerce and to violation of the antitrust laws. It follows then that the investigations by the Federal Trade Commission can be made for only two purposes:

1. To investigate violations of law.

2. To investigate such matters as directly affect interstate commerce with a view to transmitting information and recommendations to Congress for consideration for purposes of legislation.

None of these resolutions is for either purpose. It is claimed that the authority for such resolutions is found in that portion of the Federal Trade Commission act, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the commission shall also have power—

"(a) To gather and compile information concerning, and to investigate from time to time, the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

"(b) To require, by general or special orders, corporations engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, or any class of them, or any of them, respectively, to file with the commission in such form as the commission may prescribe annual or special, or both annual and special, reports or answers in writing to specific questions, furnishing to the commission such information as it may require as to the organization, business, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, partnerships, and individuals of the respective corporations filing such reports or answers in writing. Such reports and answers shall be made under oath, or otherwise, as the commission may prescribe, and shall be filed with the commission within such reasonable period as the commission may prescribe, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission.

* * * * * * *

"(f) To make public from time to time such portions of the information obtained by it hereunder, except trade secrets and names of customers, as it shall deem expedient in the public interest; and to make annual and special reports to the Congress and to submit therewith recommendations for additional legislation; and to provide for the publication of its reports and decisions in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use."

"Commerce," as used in the above quotation, of course means interstate commerce, as is especially stated in the statute. It will be seen that the statute says in section (a) "any corporation engaged in commerce"; in section (b) "corporations engaged in commerce." None of these resolutions is so limited to commerce or to corporations engaged in such commerce. "The declared purpose" of each of these investigations, according to Commissioner Myers, the author, is "to develop facts or interest" relative to "important economic questions." Economic questions involve three different elements, "production, consumption, and distribution." (Webster's International Dictionary.)

Manufacture and production is not interstate commerce, and Congress has no power or authority to legislate in relation thereto. In the recent case of the Utah-Idaho, etc., v. F. T. C., C. C. A. (8th Cir. Oct. 21, 1927), it is stated: "It is well settled that production and manufacture is not commerce." Other authorities to the same effect are: U. S. v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1 (12); Hopkins v. U. S., 171 U. S. 578 (592); U. S. v. Joint, etc., 171 U. S. 505 (567–8); United Leather, etc., v. Herkert, 265 U. S. 457 (471); Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251 (272–3); Industrial, etc., v. U. S., 268 U. S. 64 (80).

Consequently, the commission could not investigate economic questions for the purpose of furnishing information to Congress in so far as production and manufacture are concerned, because that is a question with which Congress is not concerned and about which it can not legislate. Such investigations could not be of any possible use to the commission, as its only power is to issue orders to cease and desist from violations of law.

So far as I can conceive, such investigations for the use of either Congress or the commission are equally purposeless and useless.

The argument was made for the first time before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives that these resolutions are limited by the provisions of the statute, even if such provisions are not written into the resolutions themselves. It would seem that this is rather a belated argument to sustain the action of the commission, in view of the fact that each resolution expressly declares that its purpose is to investigate economic questions, and in view of the further fact that the action of the economic division in conducting these investigations up to date shows that they construed such resolutions as directing them to investigate economic questions, and that is what has been done. In other words, the limitations of the statutes up to this time in these investigations has been entirely disregarded. It is hardly to be expected that an employee will interpret a resolution different from its plainly declared purpose. It was not done in the present instance.

Does any Member of Congress believe that if these resolutions had contained the wording of the statute that the investigations would have been made? In view of the fact that investigators have already been sent to various parts of the country in pursuance of these resolutions, making economic investigations along the lines directed in the resolutions, does any Member of Congress believe that such interpretation was placed upon such resolutions by the proponents thereof prior to the time that the House Committee on Appropriations questioned the authority of the commission to make these investigations?

In any event what would an economic investigation be worth for any purpose that was limited solely to the direct effect that such economic practices had on interstate commerce?

I find nothing anywhere in the statute that even hints that the commission has power to make economic investigations, for such investigations must necessarily go beyond the question upon which Congress can legislate. Such investigations must necessarily go beyond the power of the commission to investigate on its own initiative, because they involve subjects over which the States alone have control. It is significant that the Federal Trade Commission act itself limits the power of the commission to investigate, when directed by the President or either House of Congress, "to any alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation."

I can not believe that it is a reasonable construction of the statute to say that the commission has such wide power to investigate on its own motion and so limited a power when directed by the President or Congress. I can not reach the conclusion that the courts will ever place such broad construction upon our power.

On the question of our authority to make such investigations it might be worth while to note that in so far as I know there was no discussion by the commission of the legal questions involved before the passage of these resolutions. Neither have the legal questions involved been submitted to the chief counsel or to any other attorney representing the commission for an opinion thereon, either before or since the passage of the resolutions. This is a departure from the precedents and practices of the commission. Of the three members out of five of the commission that voted to pass three of these resolutions, only two were lawyers, and only one lawyer who voted for these three resolutions—Mr. Myers—is now a member of the commission.

POLICY

Assuming that we have the legal authority—which I do not believe—as a matter of policy I am opposed to these resolutions. The appropriation bill for 1928 contained the following provision:

"No part of this sum shall be expended for investigations requested by either House of Congress, except those requested by concurrent resolution of Congress; but this limitation shall not apply to investigations and reports in connection with alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation."

I can not believe that Congress ever intended that we should have the authority to make an investigation on our own initiative that Congress would not permit us to make upon the request of either House of Congress. If Congress did not want us to spend the time and money of the commission for such investigations upon the request of either House, I can find no theory that would satisfy me in concluding that Congress wanted the commission to do this thing of its own motion. Even if it be admitted that said provision in the appropriation bill did not apply in letter to investigations initiated by the commission, I can not escape the conviction that it did in spirit. In my judgment, by that action Congress clearly expressed the intention that it did not favor investigations by the commission that were broader than the commission could make upon the direction of either House of Congress; that is, that Congress clearly showed that it did not favor any investigations except when limited to "alleged violations of antitrust acts by any corporation."

None of the resolutions referred to is so limited, nor is there any claim that it was intended to so limit them. Commissioner Myers, the author of these resolutions, in a memorandum submitted to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, says:

"The declared purpose of these inquiries was to employ the time and talent of its corps of economists, industrial experts, and investigators as much as possible on constructive inquiries which would develop facts of interest and benefit to Congress and to the business world in the consideration of important economic questions."

In view of that declaration, I can not escape the feeling that each of these resolutions is a clear and direct evasion of the foregoing quoted provision in the appropriation bill. I can see no benefit that can come from any of these investigations. The fact is that the material information—if there is any—that can be secured under these resolutions, could be secured from an encyclopedia, the Census Bureau, and the Department of Commerce for a mere fraction of what it would cost the commission. It would be useless for us to furnish a report on these investigations to Congress for the purpose of legislation, for Congress can not legislate upon economic grounds, except upon the narrow proposition, as they may directly affect interstate commerce.

As the questions of production and manufacture and consumption are necessary and most important items that must be considered in any economic investigation, and as they do not involve interstate commerce, it follows that we would be doing a useless thing to make these investigations for the purpose of furnishing information to Congress to be used in legislation.

Another thing: I can not escape the conviction that if Congress wanted these investigations made they would have directed us to do so. Such investigations can not possibly furnish any basis for action by the commission and could be of no service to the commission, as we can not issue orders to cease and desist based upon economic grounds. Our orders must all be based on some alleged violation of law. There is no allegation of violation of law in any one of these resolutions. I am strongly inclined to believe that all investigations of the commission should be limited to alleged violations of the antitrust acts or to some interference with interstate commerce. I doubt if any investigations for the purpose of furnishing information to Congress should be made unless directed by Congress.

The report of the Senate committee on the Federal Trade Commission bill says, referring to the proposed commission: "The powers, of course, must be large, but the exercise of the powers will not be against law-abiding business, but against lawless business."

I am in harmony with that statement. I have a conviction that it is to the public interest that any concern that obeys the law should be free from the expense, the annoyance, and injury of any investigation by the Federal Trade Commission.

RESOLUTIONS

The first resolution, which is in regard to resale-price maintenance: This matter has been investigated many times by different committees of Congress. It seems to me that about all the wisdom extant on this proposition has already been secured by these committees. Congress has declared for the policy of competition in this country. I can not believe that Congress desires to legalize price fixing, and unless it does such an investigation to furnish information to Congress would be useless. I can not escape the conviction that if Congress wanted us to investigate for the purpose of furnishing information on this question, it would direct us so to do. The commission needs no information on this subject, as the law is sufficient, and the Supreme Court has said in a very recent case that the purposes of the law are clearly enough stated in the opinions that it has rendered on the subject. (F. T. C. v. American Tobacco Co., 274 U. S. 543.)

2. In regard to the blue sky resolution, I do not understand its purpose. Apparently it is to furnish information for State as well as Federal regulation. I do not conceive it to be any part of the duty of the commission to investigate in order to furnish information to State legislatures. In any event, the information sought by this resolution could be secured in the library from statutes and decisions instead of doing as the commission is now doing—sending men to various parts of the country to make inquiries in relation to the matter.

3. In regard to the questions involved in the resolutions in relation to the economical distribution of commodities, I think the laws that exist fully cover the questions involved.

4. In regard to the resolutions directing the investigation of the du Pont Co. and the General Motors Corporation, inasmuch as they allege no violation of the law, I can not see its purpose, unless it was—as the resolution apparently intends—to investigate these great concerns with a view to telling them whether or not they are properly running their business.

(During the reading of the above memorandum the following occurred:)

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman state from what page he is reading?

Mr. WOOD. I am reading from a memorandum or brief.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is not in the hearings of the subcommittee?

Mr. WOOD. No; it is a brief submitted by Mr. Humphrey to me, to be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. From listening to the statement of the gentleman, and also from seeing a great many statements in the press of Commissioner Humphrey, one would judge he does not want to make any investigations at all.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, no; Mr. Humphrey wants to make every investigation that is warranted by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one hour more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana was speaking about Mr. Myers. I do not know anything at all about him. I do know Mr. Humphrey, because I served in the House with him for several years, and I also know that there is one splendid lawyer on the commission, Judge McCulloch, of my State, who for many years was chief justice of the supreme court of our State and one of the ablest members of the supreme court we ever had, and I would suggest that the gentleman in criticizing the commission should certainly leave Judge McCulloch out of such criticism.

Mr. WOOD. I did not mention Judge McCulloch, did I?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; and the gentleman knows he is a real lawyer or would know that if the gentleman ever had any contact with him.

Mr. WOOD. No; I have never had any contact with him. I understand that is correct.

Mr. OLDFIELD. He was a great judge in our State.

Mr. WOOD. Yes; and I understand the judge does not subscribe to these highfalutin ideas of Mr. Myers.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not know anything about that, but I would resent very seriously any suggestion with respect to Judge McCulloch's ability.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask a little broader question than the one that has been discussed here in the last few minutes. May I ask the gentleman to cite any one act during the life of the Federal Trade Commission or any one decision it has rendered that has been worth while for the American people or for the taxpayers of this country. Has the Federal Trade Commission, in the course of its life, benefited trade?

Mr. WOOD. Well, that is a pretty broad question, and I suspect that several instances might be cited. I can see where it could be a great agency for good if they would confine themselves to the purposes for which they were organized.

I expect that the commission had much to do with the cessation of the Pittsburgh-plus proposition.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I understand, the gentleman is objecting to the commission instituting inquiries on their own motion?

Mr. WOOD. No; I am not.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I refer to economic inquiries.

Mr. WOOD. I am objecting to instituting anything on their own motion unless they have a prima facie case that it is a violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I want to call attention that since 1921 the commission has only initiated or put into motion nine inquiries of that kind—the anthracite-coal price in 1923; cooperation in foreign countries, 1924; terminal elevators, 1924; lumber associations, 1926; Pan Handle Petroleum, 1926; and four they have initiated this year—the resale-price question, the price-sale bases, the blue-sky, and the du Pont investigations.

Mr. WOOD. To show you how absolutely futile some of their actions are take this blue-sky investigation, to which the gentleman refers. Of course, we are all interested in blue-sky legislation. The only thing they expected to do was to find out the action of the several States on the blue-sky proposition. They have a man now on the Pacific coast investigating the law with reference to blue sky. If you go into the law library, you can get all that information, all that would be of any interest to this Congress for legislative purposes.

Yet we are spending thousands of dollars on that proposition. I think in one of these resolutions the gentleman expressed the purpose that the clerks not being otherwise employed we are going to do this thing.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman said a moment ago that he was not opposed to the Federal Trade Commission making inquiry and initiating investigations providing it was for violation of the antitrust law. The gentleman is falling into the same error that Mr. Humphrey has fallen into, because he repeatedly calls it an antitrust statute. The statute itself in the authority given to the Federal Trade Commission under subsection (a) of section 6 does not in any sense refer to any trust or unlawful combination, but gives the commission the right to initiate investigations concerning the practices and methods of corporations.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will go further and read the decisions of the Supreme Court on that statute he will see that they have held that that means a violation of the trust act by those engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BYRNS. The only reference in this Trade Commission act to trusts or investigations of trusts is subsection (d), which provides that such investigations can be made on the request of the President or either House of Congress. The gentleman attempts to read back subsection (d) into subsection (a).

Another thing, section 5 of the act deals with unfair competition. Certainly the gentleman would not prevent the Trade Commission from making an investigation——

Mr. WOOD. The Supreme Court has held that any unfair practice is a violation of the trust act.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will pardon me, does not the gentleman think an investigation to see whether or not there has been unfair practice or some combination in violation of the antitrust law of the United States by some instrumentality of the Government should first be made, rather than a mere charge based possibly on suspicion and entering into court for dissolution. Ought not the facts to be developed first? The gentleman's statement would deny the commission the right to make any investigation unless there was proof in advance that there was a violation?

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is misstating my position. I think what they ought to do is to exercise a little common sense in trying to carry out the purposes of the act.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. I am interested to get the gentleman's position. I understand that the Attorney General and the Comptroller General have both ruled that these investigations on their own motion are legal.

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. In the report of the gentleman's subcommittee I notice a statement here which strikes me, which states that the attention of the Comptroller General has also been called to these matters, and it is hoped that "further expenditures of Federal funds for unlawful investigations may be prohibited." There have been no unlawful investigations, have there?

Mr. WOOD. Yes; half of them have been unlawful.

Mr. KELLY. But the Comptroller General and the Attorney General say not.

Mr. WOOD. I shall modify the statement that I made. I do not think there have been any since we adopted this restriction, except this, that they did carry out those that were already in motion at that time, and the Comptroller General paid them because of the fact that they were authorized by the resolutions.

Mr. KELLY. But the Comptroller General does not usually pay anything that he is not fully convinced of himself.

Mr. WOOD. As I say, he was authorized. I would not say that they were unlawful in every respect, because they were authorized by resolution, and they were put in force by the fact of the resolution, but they were clearly outside of the field for which this commission was created.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of this as the report of the committee. This does not purport to be the report of the committee. This is a report from Mr. Wood, "from the Committee on Appropriations." This is the report of the chairman of the subcommittee, and not the committee's report, because, of course, the committee never saw this until after it was submitted.

Mr. BYRNS. If it is the committee's report, then there are a great many on the committee, I will say, that do not agree with it.

Mr. KELLY. That clears up the statement, then, that this is not the committee's report?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And if the gentleman would yield, I would say that this is not my view. This does not express my view in regard to the matter.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] might have either concurred in it or not, if he had been there. I do not know whether he would or not, but he was not there.

Mr. WASON. And, if the gentleman will yield, I am a member of that committee, and this is the first time that I have ever heard any objections to the report.

Mr. WOOD. I expect the gentleman from Washington would have either concurred in it or expressed his opinion at the time it was adopted, if he had been there.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This matter was discussed in the whole committee when the subcommittee reported the bill to it—not the wording of the report, but the new wording that was inserted in the law, and attention was called to the fact that it was somewhat different from what had been agreed upon in the subcommittee.

Mr. WOOD. No; it is no different at all from what was agreed on in subcommittee, and I want to say in passing, and then I am done with this thing, so far as I am concerned, each individual of this Congress ought to be as much interested in protecting the Treasury of the United States as I am, and each individual member of this committee, and of the Congress can know, if he will, that we have been wasting thousands of dollars in this activity that has never amounted to anything.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is not what we are discussing now.

Mr. WOOD. I am not sure whether the gentleman knows what we are discussing or not.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In regard to the proviso and the limitation now in the bill, I do not think the gentleman from Indiana would say that the subcommittee agreed upon the language contained in that limitation.

Mr. WOOD. I do not know why they did not agree to it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will tell the gentleman why. It was because the subcommittee agreed on an amendment by the inclusion of the word "economic" before the word "investigation," which appears here in line 21, of page 17 of the bill, and never agreed to the inclusion of the words "including economic investigations," and I feel certain that the gentleman from Indiana will not stand on the floor and say that that is not the amendment he proposed.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the gentleman is absolutely earnest and honest in the statement that he makes, but I feel also that I am at least entitled to the same respect when I say that the language is exactly as I supposed it was to be.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman not recall using the word, saying that he wanted to insert one word?

Mr. WOOD. The word "economic." It is the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum, as to whether you put the word in before or after the comma. I don't care. You can take the comma out, if you want to.

Let us now proceed. Next I come to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The committee recommends appropriations for the Interstate Commerce Commission, in accordance with the estimates submitted in the Budget, with but two exceptions. For the Bureau of Locomotive Inspection the committee recommends that the sum of $493,856 be appropirated for the year 1929. This sum equals the appropriations for the current year, but exceeds the Budget estimate by $2,408. For printing and binding the sum of $265,000 is recommended to be appropriated, which sum is $10,000 in excess of that estimated in the Budget. The work of the commission is increasing and the volumes of decisions are essential not only to the work of the commission but to those engaged upon pending matters, and the committee is of the opinion that sufficient funds should be appropriated to make these decisions available.

For the general expenses of the commission the sum of $2,564,500 is recommended to be appropriated. The sum is $103,900 more than the amount available for similar purposes for the current fiscal year and is made necessary by the increasing number of formal cases being filed before the commission. For the past several years the committee has increased this appropriation to provide for sufficient personnel to enable the commission to keep pace with the increased volume of work, but it has been found difficult to obtain competent employees, and the committee is of the opinion that the sum recommended is sufficient to meet the actual needs of the commission for the ensuing fiscal year.

For the Bureau of Valuation the committee recommends the sum of $2,200,000 for 1929. Under the three-year program adopted by the committee in making appropriations for the completion of the primary valuation work of the railroads, it is gratifying for the committee to be enabled to make the following statement:

To bring the primary valuations of steam railroads to date, the committee has again adopted a program in making appropriations, which will enable the commission to complete this work within the next three years. The following statement shows the status of this work at the present time:

VETERANS' BUREAU

For the Veterans' Bureau for the ensuing fiscal year the committee recommends appropriations in accordance with the Budget estimates. The total amount recommended to be appropriated is $485,560,000, a decrease of $7,240,000, as compared with the appropriations for the current fiscal year.

For military and naval compensation an appropriation of $195,000,000 is recommended. On October 31, 1927, there were 247,165 total-disability claims and 86,727 death claims, a grand total of 333,892. Disbursements for that month amounted to $15,792,333. For the fiscal year 1929 it is estimated there will be a total of $341,178 compensation claims, involving an expenditure of $195,000,000.

For adjusted compensation an appropriation of $112,000,000 is provided in the accompanying bill. The following statement briefly sets forth expenditures under the World War adjusted compensation act:

TARIFF COMMISSION

The committee recommends that the sum of $754,000 be appropriated for the expenses of the Tariff Commission for the ensuing fiscal year. This sum is $68,000 in excess of the amounts available for the current year, and it is hoped that with this additional appropriation the investigations and reports of the commission may be made and completed within reasonable periods.

SHIPPING BOARD

Appropriations for the Shipping Board are recommended in accordance with the Budget estimates and aggregate $288,750. It was developed during the hearings that approximately 269 employees with salaries aggregating $733,980 were engaged upon work of the Shipping Board, but were carried upon the rolls of the Merchant Fleet Corporation, and paid from money available for the expenses of the corporation. To prevent such details in the future, the committee recommends the following provision be made a part of the paragraph making appropriations for the Shipping Board:

Provided, That the annual estimates of the Shipping Board for the fiscal year 1930 shall include the salaries of all employees whose service with the board has become permanent through detail from the Merchant Fleet Corporation.

The committee recommends that the salary of the secretary to the board be fixed at $7,500 so long as the position is retained by the present incumbent, and in the event of a change in incumbency, compensation for that position shall be in accordance with the classification act of 1923.

MERCHANT FLEET CORPORATION

The committee invites especial attention to pages 606–813, inclusive, of the hearings on this bill, which relate to the Shipping Board and the Merchant Fleet Corporation. The activities of the various bureaus of the board and the corporation, personnel, claims, and operating data and information are fully set forth, and perhaps better than ever before set out the status of our merchant marine.

In order to briefly place before the Congress the more pertinent features of the physical operation of the merchant marine, the following statement has been prepared, which sets forth the personnel employed, operating data and results, the status of the construction loan, Dieselization, insurance, and liquidation funds, vessels sold and the laid-up fleet, and the number and nature of all claims:
